In other words, it is proposed by the bill under discussion as a first essential step to clear the way of all obstructions, so that Congress may constitutionally and rightfully rise in the scale of legislative power and action to that position which time and circumstance have demonstrated is absolutely necessary to meet this political scourge, by wiping out of existence every treaty stipulation with China which in any manner or in any form recognizes or permits the coming of Chinese to this country, or which inhibits the United States from absolutely prohibiting Chinese immigration to the United States; and then, the right of way to Congress being thus clearly secured, the bill proposes to absolutely prohibit the coming of Chinese whether subjects of the Chinese Empire or otherwise, as well those who have been here and have returned, those who are now here and who may hereafter leave the United States and attempt to return, as those who have never yet been within our limits, to any port or place within the United States, or from landing or remaining therein, excepting only diplomatic, consular, or other commissioned officers and their household and body servants.

In considering this bill two questions of importance present themselves:

First. Has the United States the constitutional right or power by an act of the Congress to abrogate or repeal a treaty with a foreign nation; and Second. If so, does the importance to this country of the questions involved, the magnitude of the evil to be dealt with, the interests of the people to be subserved, the institutions that are to be protected, the peril that is to be warded off, and the preservation and vindication of the public peace, justify the step proposed?

First, as to the constitutional power of Congress to abrogate or repeal an existing treaty between the United States and a foreign nation. And, further, does a subsequent act of Congress repeal and abrogate the provisions of a prior treaty with a foreign nation in so far as it conflicts with such provisions?

These are propositions so well settled as to require but little more than the statement of the proposition and a reference to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. And but for the fact that this power has, since the introduction of the bill under discussion, and with an air of self-importance as amazing as it is absurd and ridiculous, been flatly denied by one of the great journals of the metropolis (the New York Times) and its senseless assertion taken up and, parrot-like, repeated in an ignorant as well as an offensive manner by the Post of the national capital, no argument whatever in its support would now be offered.

The morning subsequent to the introduction of the bill under consideration the New York Times, in its issue of the 12th instant, had the following editorial:

> Senator MITCHELL, of Oregon, has introduced a new anti-Chinese bill by which he coolly proposes to sweep away all treaty provisions which stand in the way of an absolute prohibition of Chinese immigration, and to exclude from the country all Mongolian immigrants and prevent the return of any that may leave the country. The logical sequel of this kind of legislation would be a provision for sending out of the country all the Chinese now here, which would place us squarely on the policy of China of a generation ago. The chief drawback about this policy is that it does not discriminate on the proper lines. If we are to exclude from this country objectionable immigrants we should so draw the line as to exclude those that are objectionable because they are objectionable, and not those that belong to one particular race because they belong to that race. If we are going to filter the incoming population we should so arrange our strainer as to exclude the scum. It may be stated also for Senator Mitchell's information that treaties can not be amended or abrogated by statute law.

While in its issue of February 15 the constitutional expounder of the Washington Post exposed his consummate stupidity on the subject by the following editorial:

> The anti-Chinese bill introduced by Senator MITCHELL, of Oregon, shows two things—his narrow-mindedness and his ignorance. He proposes to sweep away all treaty obligations that affect immigration from China. Yet, he ought to know that a treaty can not be abrogated by an act of Congress. His bill prohibits all Chinese immigration. The purpose is to prevent the admission to the country of objectionable immigrants. But this bill declares against a certain class, not because they are objectionable, but because they are Chinese. The illiberality and the ignorance seem to be furnished in equal quantities.

Now, then, Mr. President, as the constitutional lawyers of the New York Times and the Washington Post have, in the infinitude of their professional wisdom and the profundity of their constitutional and international lore, so kindly for my information volunteered the statement that "treaties can not be amended or abrogated by statute law," I shall take the liberty for their information, as also for all interested, to attract attention to a few suggestions upon that point; and I do this not so much for the mere purpose of proving what every lawyer knows to be true—that is to say, that Congress has the undoubted power to abrogate our existing treaties with China—but rather for the purpose of calling attention to the fact that our courts, lawyers, jurists, and best statesmen while conceding this power, have concurred as to the duty of Congress to abrogate a treaty whenever it is pernicious in its operations or ruinous to the state. And in this connection I assert it as a fact that the doctrine that a subsequent act of Congress in so far as it conflicts with the provisions of a prior treaty with a foreign power or an Indian tribe abrogates the treaty to that extent, is one that has received the unqualified sanction of every department of this Government, legislative, executive, administrative, and judicial, and no man but an ignoramus in the profession, and I might perhaps say with propriety in every other respect as well, would expose himself or his paper to ridicule by asserting to the contrary.

True, article 6 of the Constitution provides that—

This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereo, fand all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land.

Even though the doctrine that a subsequent statute in direct conflict with a prior statute, whether purporting to repeal the former, or that otherwise operates as such repeal, could not be properly applied to a case of a subsequent statute coming in direct conflict with a prior treaty, the contention can be successfully maintained, and has been time out of mind, that for certain great purposes for which the Constitution was ordained and established by the people of the United States, such as the common defense and general welfare, including the power to declare war; to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States; to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises; to coin money and regulate the value thereof; to raise and support armies; to borrow money on the credit of the United States; to establish a uniform rule of naturalization; to promote the progress of science and useful arts; to provide and maintain a navy; and in fact all the powers vested in Congress by the Constitution, the powers so vested can not be taken away, impaired, or in any manner abridged by the Executive and the Senate in pursuance of the exercise of the treaty-making power.

The supreme right on the part of the Government to exercise at all times and under all circumstances through the Congress any power delegated to it by the Constitution, and the exercise of which in its judgment may become necessary to the vindication of the great rights which pertain to the common defense and the general welfare, stands pre-eminent, above and beyond the reach or assailment of any other power, whether executive, judicial, or administrative; and the treaty-making power, although guaranteed by the Constitution, is limited and subordinated to the exercise by Congress of those supreme powers necessary to the execution of the general purposes specified, for which the Constitution was ordained, and the right to exercise which are by the terms of the Constitution, specifically or inferentially, granted to Congress.

Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution, volume 3, section 1502, makes the following statement:

The treaty-making power is necessarily and obviously subordinate to the fundamental laws and constitution of the state, and it can not change the form of the Government or annihilate its constitutional powers.

Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution again in section 1508, volume 2, in speaking of the treaty-making power remarks as follows:

The power to make treaties is by the Constitution general, and of course it embraces all sorts of treaties—for peace or war, for commerce or territory, for allowance or succors, for indemnity for injuries or payment of debts, for the recognition and enforcement of principles of public law, and for any other purposes which the policy or interests of independent sovereigns may decide in their intercourse with each other. But though the power is thus general and unrestrained, it is not to be so construed as to destroy the fundamental law of the state.

A power given by the Constitution can not be construed to authorize a destruction of other powers given in the same instrument. It must be construed, therefore, in subordination to it, and can not supersede or interfere with any other of its fundamental provisions. Each is equally obligatory and of paramount authority within its scope, and no one embraces a right to annihilate any other. A treaty to change the organization of the Government or annihilate its sovereignty, to overturn its republican form, or to deprive it of its constitutional powers, would be void, because it would destroy what it was designed merely to fulfill—the will of the people.

Inasmuch, therefore, as the Congress has by virtue of an express grant in the Constitution the "power to regulate commerce with foreign nations," and inasmuch as the Burlingame treaty is in all its essential particulars nothing more nor less than a regulation of commerce between the United States and China, and as an act of Congress inhibiting the coming of Chinese to this country and absolutely excluding them from it would be the exercise of the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, it therefore follows that the making of the treaty did not and constitutionally could not, in any manner or in any respect, impair the power of Congress to pass a prohibitory act whenever in its judgment it became necessary to do this; and to hold that the Burlingame treaty and the treaty supplementary thereto should be construed as an inhibition on the power of Congress to pass a prohibitory law, would be simply to declare that the treaty itself was absolutely void, because in such a case the effect of the treaty would be to deprive Congress of its constitutional power.

But the doctrine that a subsequent act of Congress abrogates a prior treaty in so far as it conflicts with its provisions is one that has been recognized in this Government since the matter was first discussed or the question raised nearly ninety years ago; and it has received the sanction of every department of the Government—legislative, executive, administrative, and judicial—commencing with its exercise by Congress, when in July 7, 1798, an act of Congress was passed abrogating our treaties with France. That act declared among other things as follows:

That the United States are of right freed and exonerated from the stipulations of the treaties and of the consular convention heretofore concluded between the United States and France; and that the same shall not henceforth be regarded as legally obligatory on the Government of the United States or citizens of the United States.

But not only so. The Department of Justice has through its Attorneys-General, at different times, proclaimed this doctrine in unqualified terms. Attorney-General Crittenden (see Opinions Attorneys-General, volume 5, page 345), in discussing the question of conflict between a prior treaty and a subsequent act of Congress with reference to the Florida claims, uses the following language:

An act of Congress is as much a supreme law of the land as a treaty. They are placed on the same footing, and no preference or superiority is given to the one or the other. The last expression of the law-giving power must prevail; and just for the same reason and on the same principle that a subsequent act must prevail and have effect, though inconsistent with a prior act, so must an act of Congress have effect though inconsistent with a prior treaty.

Again, Attorney-General Akerman, as late as the year 1870, in the case of the Choctaw Indians (see Opinions Attorneys-General, volume 13, page 357), said:

There is nothing in the Constitution which assigns different ranks to treaties and to statutes; both the one and the other, when not inconsistent with the Constitution, seem to stand upon the same level and to be of equal validity; and as in the case of all laws emanating from an equal authority, the earlier in date yields to the later.

But not only so. Repeatedly has the Federal judiciary through its circuit and supreme courts, without reserve, doubt, or qualification of the doctrine, held that the power to abrogate a treaty with a foreign power, as well as with the Indian tribes, does not rest exclusively with the Executive and the Senate, but does reside in the Congress. The court, in Taylor vs. Martin (2 Curtis's Circuit Court Reports, 454), in discussing this subject, uses the following language:

It is impossible to maintain that under our Constitution the President and the Senate exclusively possess the power to modify or repeal a law found in a treaty. If this were true no change in a treaty could be made without the consent of some foreign government. That the Constitution was designed to place our country in this helpless condition is a supposition wholly inadmissible. It is not only inconsistent with the necessities of a nation, but negatived by the express words of the Constitution. That gives to Congress, in so many words, power to declare war, an act which ipso facto repeals all treaties inconsistent with a state of war. It can not, therefore, be admitted that the only method of escape from a treaty is by the consent of the other party to it or a declaration of war.

To refuse to execute a treaty for reasons which approve themselves to the conscientious judgment of a nation is a matter of the utmost gravity, but the power to do so is a prerogative of which no nation can be deprived without deeply affecting its independence. That the people of the United States have deprived their Government of this power I do not believe; that it must reside somewhere and be applicable to all cases I am convinced, and I feel no doubt that it belongs to Congress.

But the Supreme Court of the United States, the supreme arbiter in all questions of this character, finally settled the doctrine beyond the power of future controversy in this country in the case known as "the Cherokee Tobacco case," reported in 11 Wallace, page 616. The court in that case, opinion by Mr. Justice Swayne, uses the following language:

The effect of treaties and of acts of Congress, when in conflict, is not settled by the Constitution. But the question is not involved in any doubt as to its proper solution. The treaty may supersede a prior act of Congress (2 Peters, 314), and an act of Congress may supersede a prior treaty (2 Curtis, 454; 1 Woolworth, 155).

In the cases referred to these principles were applied to treaties with foreign nations. Treaties with Indian nations can not be more obligatory. They have no higher sanctity and no greater inviolability or immunity from legislative invasion can be claimed for them. The act of Congress must prevail as if the treaty were not an element to be considered. If a wrong has been done the power of redress is with Congress, not with the judiciary.

This doctrine, so well settled that it is a matter of amazement that any one, much less the constitutional expounders of great metropolitan journals, should assert to the contrary, was fully recognized by President Hayes in his veto message of March 1, 1879, wherein he gave his reasons for withholding his approval of the bill passed both Houses of that Congress restricting the immigration of Chinese to the United States; although on the ground of policy solely he vetoed the bill, he in terms recognized the power of Congress to abrogate the Burlingame treaty in these words:

The authority of Congress to terminate a treaty with a foreign power, by expressing the will of the nation no longer to adhere to it, is as free from controversy under our Constitution as is the further proposition that the power of making new treaties or modifying existing treaties is not lodged by the Constitution in Congress, but in the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, as shown by the concurrence of two-thirds of that body.

A further declaration is made in this message:

A denunciation of any treaty by any government is confessedly justifiable only upon some reason, both of the higest justice and of the highest necessity.

And in this connection it may not be out of place to attract attention to the fact that in the passage of the bill in the Forty-fifth Congress abrogating the Burlingame treaty the two Houses of Congress by a most decided vote declared not only in favor of the power of Congress to abrogate a treaty with a foreign power, but did actually in that particular instance, in so far as the Congress could do it in the absence of executive approval, absolutely abrogate, set aside, and repeal the Burlingame treaty. The vote on the passage of that bill was in the House of Representatives 155 yeas, 72 nays, not voting 61, and most of whom were paired. The vote in detail is as follows:

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. MULLER. On this question I am paired with my colleague from New York, Mr. Willis. If he were present, he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. HUNTON. My colleague, Mr. Goode, is absent by reason of sickness and is paired with Mr. Camp, of New York.

Mr. HAMILTON. My colleagues, Mr. Brown and Mr. Fuller, are absent and paired. I do not know how they would vote if they were here.

Mr. PHELPS. I desire to announce that on this question Mr. Ballou, of Rhode Island, is paired with Mr. Henry, of Maryland.

Mr. HERBERT. My colleague, Mr. Forney, is absent by order of the House, serving on a committee.

Mr. TUCKER. I am paired generally on all political questions with Mr. Lapham, of New York.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am paired with Mr. Wait, of Connecticut.

Mr. RYAN. My colleague, Mr. Phillips, is absent on important business. If present, I think he would vote "ay."

Mr. HALE. My colleague, Mr. Frye, is absent by order of the House, serving on a committee.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. My colleague, Mr. Brown, is absent by reason of sickness.

Mr. METCALFE. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. Bland. As I am assured that if present he would vote "ay." I will vote "ay."

Mr. STONE, of Iowa. I am paired with Mr. Shelley, of Alabama. If he were here, I would vote "no."

Mr. HENKLE. On political questions my colleague, Mr. Henry, is paired with Mr. Ballou, of Rhode Island.

Mr. BOYD. I am paired with Mr. Roberts, of Maryland.

Mr. OLIVER. I am paired with Mr. Carlisle, of Kentucky. If he were here, I would vote "no" and I am informed he would vote "ay."

Mr. MCKENZIE. I am paired with Mr. Powers, of Maine.

Mr. HASKELL. I am paired with Mr. Knott, of Kentucky.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with Mr. McKinley, of Ohio.

Mr. BRAGG. My colleague, Mr. Lynde, is absent by order of the House, serving on a committee.

Mr. MAISH. My colleague, Mr. Clymer, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. EVANS, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. Clymer.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The vote in the Senate was yeas 39, nays 27; as follows:

All of whom voting yea, I will state for the information of the New York Times and the Washington Post, voted to abrogate a treaty by an act of Congress.

But not only so. A doctrine akin to this has been recognized time and time again by Congress in the passage of revenue laws. In 1857 the United States entered into a treaty with Denmark in which there was a provision to the effect that "no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any article, the produce or manufacture of the dominion of the treaty-making power, than are or should be payable on like articles, being the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country."

Subsequently, in 1875, the United States entered into a treaty with the Hawaiian Islands in which certain products were admitted free of duty, and it was insisted upon the part of the exporters in Denmark that by virtue of the provision in the Hawaiian treaty similar products to those admitted under the Hawaiian treaty should come in free of duty, but the circuit court for the southern district of New York held as follows:

The stipulation in a treaty with a foreign power to the effect that no higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any article, the produce or manufacture of the dominion of the treaty-making power, than are or shall be payable on the like articles the produce or manufacture of any other foreign country, does not prevent Congress from passing an act exempting from duty like products and manufactures imported from any particular foreign dominion it may see fit.

And although we have similar provisions to that contained in our treaty with Denmark, in our treaties with Prussia, Sweden and Norway, the Two Sicilies, Portugal, Nicaragua, Hayti, Honduras, and Italy, yet none of these provisions in these several treaties has ever stood in the way of Congress enacting such tariff laws as was deemed necessary and proper.

In fact, the national House of Representatives so long ago as on the 7th day of April, 1796, adopted a resolution declaring that when a treaty depended for the execution of any of its stipulations on an act of Congress, it was the right and duty of the House to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such treaty into effect. And though it is a fact that President Washington in his message of 30th of March, 1796, denied this right on the part of the House of Representatives, it has been exercised time and time again during all the administrations of the past.

It is true a doctrine contrary to that which has become firmly settled in this country as applicable to treaties between certain nations, and to which the United States is not a party, has sometime been asserted but not maintained by these foreign nations; as, for instance, the congress of Paris in 1856, in which Great Britain, France, Prussia, Sardinia, and Freiburg were represented by ministers plenipotentiary, declared it to be an essential principle of the law of nations that—

None of them can liberate itself from the engagements of a treaty nor modify the stipulations thereof unless with the consent of the contracting parties by means of an amicable understanding.

But this doctrine has never received the sanction of either the executive, administrative, or judicial authorities of this country; nor has the doctrine been practically acted upon, carried out, or enforced by any of the governments represented in that congress; but, on the contrary, a notable example of an entire repudiation of this doctrine by Great Britain is to be found in the passage by the British Parliament of the act of 1870 abrogating in part our extradition treaty with that Government of 1842. And it may as well be remembered by those who are so punctilious upon the subject of interference with treaty stipulations that Great Britain in the passage of that act did so without making any inquiries whatever of the Government of the United States, and without soliciting its consent, and without giving any notice whatever of its intention to modify the provisions of the extradition treaty by an act of Parliament.

During the discussion of the Chinese question in the Senate in May, 1876, this very question as to the power of Congress to abrogate a treaty came up and was alluded to as follows:

Mr. OGLESBY. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Vermont, as I do not know myself, whether any conflict exists or not on the point concerning which I am about to inquire. Suppose under the treaty-making power a treaty should be made with China which should contain certain specific regulations upon this very question, and it should be duly ratified by the Senate, and a law of Congress under the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations should be passed upon the same subject, general but internal in its application, and yet in conflict with the terms of the treaty, I should be obliged to the Senator from Vermont to state if he knows whether there has been any determination by the Supreme Court as to how that conflict would be regarded under the Constitution of the United States. Would the law passed by Congress regulating commerce in conflict with a treaty upon that subject prevail or would the treaty prevail?

Mr. EDMUNDS. As I understand it, the Supreme Court of the United States has two or three times (but once is enough, it being a unanimous opinion) determined that under the Constitution, just as it reads, the laws passed by Congress and treaties are both of them equally the supreme law of the land, any law or regulation of a State to the contrary notwithstanding. I do not quote the words but that is the substance. Now, that being the state of the Constitution, the Supreme Court has decided unanimously more than once, and I think upon perfectly impregnable grounds, that, if a law is in conflict with a treaty that existed when the law was made, the treaty, to the extent that the law does conflict with it, is abrogated by the general sovereign power of the nation. Whether that abrogation would be an act of injustice or of war, or whatever it might be called, toward the foreign nation with whom we had the treaty, is a question with which, of course, the courts have nothing to do. On the other hand, if a law as a commercial regulation, to say nothing about the right of the House of Representatives to originate revenue bills and tariff bills—waiving all that—if a law about the introduction of persons should be passed, and afterward the President and the Senate should conclude a treaty with a foreign power which conflicted with the law, then in the same way the treaty would override the law and abrogate the law to that extent. In other words, the last act of the sovereign power exercised in either way under the Constitution, being a complete exercise of sovereign power, would prevail.

But, again, in 1879, when the act abrogating the Burlingame treaty was finally passed through both Houses of Congress, Senator Thurman, of Ohio, expressed his views upon this question as follows:

It has been said—

Referring to the prohibition of Chinese immigration—that it can only be done by the negotiation of a new treaty. I do not know that that proposition has been distinctly advocated upon this floor; but if it does lurk in the mind of any Senator I beg him to listen to the very few observations I have to make upon it.

To me it seems perfectly clear that the proposition can not for a moment be sustained, and that it would be ruinous to this country, or to any country, to hold that a treaty can only be put an end to by the negotiation of another; for that would put you completely at the mercy of the party with whom you had negotiated the treaty. Take, for instance, this very case. If we can only put an end to this treaty by negotiating a new treaty with China then it is in the power of China, by refusing to negotiate a new treaty or such a one as we desire, to hold us to this treaty, however detrimental to our interests it may be.

Mr. HAMLIN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him if he knows of any one who holds that doctrine?

Mr. THURMAN. I said I did not know; but it has been said and it has been argued, and the Senator from Maine knows very well that, when he and I were members of the other House in the celebrated Oregon discussion, it was stoutly maintained then that the convention with Great Britain, known as the Oregon convention, could not be put an end to by an act of Congress.

Mr. President, I said that the very necessity of the case requires that this power should reside in Congress. It must reside somewhere, and it must reside in that department of the Government which can judge for itself, irrespective of what any foreign power may say. The very existence of the Government itself might depend upon the exercise of this power. It is very true that if we were, without cause, to put an end to a treaty and thereby prejudice the other party to it, we should, in morals and according to the law of nations, be responsible in damages for such abrogation; but still the power to do so exists in every party to a treaty. In the nature of things it must be so. Treaties are like partnerships. There is no such thing as an indissoluble partnership; there is no such thing as an indissoluble treaty. Either party may declare it abrogated, being responsible if it abrogates it without due cause; but the treaty itself is at an end. And that Congress is the right department of the Government to put an end to it follows, as a matter of course, if it be admitted that there is some other mode of putting an end to it than by the negotiation of a new treaty. If it does not belong solely to the treaty-making part of the Government to put an end to it by the negotiation of a new treaty, then, ex necessitate, it must belong to the legislative department of the Government, and this is perfectly consistent with the declaration of the Constitution in article 6:

"This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land."

A treaty is a law according to the Constitution, and its modification or its abrogation belongs to that department of the Government which makes and unmakes laws.

Mr. President, in pursuance of this view we have again and again modified, or even abrogated, or put an end to treaties. The most notable case—one that excited this country very greatly at the time it happened—was the action of Congress in 1798 in regard to the treaties made with France, including that celebrated treaty of the Revolution with France, to which we owed so much in achieving our independence. In 1798, by act approved July 7, Congress declared as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled, That the United States are of right free and exonerated from the stipulations of the treaties and of the consular convention heretofore concluded between the United States and France, and that the same shall not henceforth be regarded as legally obligatory on the Government or citizens of the United States."

Senator Thurman, proceeding, further said:

There was a treaty abrogated expressly by act of Congress, and on the question of power it does not in the least militate against this exercise of power by Congress that the preamble to this act sets forth divers causes why the treaties ought to be abrogated, and alleges breaches of the treaty on the part of France; because, whether there was cause or not cause to abrogate that treaty, if the Congress had no power to abrogate it, if the power to abrogate it resided with the treaty-making portion of the Government, then no matter what was the cause, Congress had no right to pass that law. But it was not so regarded then. Congress did pass that law; and we have again and again since, and notably in our treaties with the Indian tribes, modified or even put an end to them, according to our own opinion of what was right and proper; and that we have that power in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States has been conclusively shown by the Senator who last spoke on this bill.

Mr. Justice Field, in the case of the Chinese laborer from Hong Kong, decided by him in United States circuit court of the ninth circuit, September 24, 1883, in discussing this very question, said:

It will not be presumed, in the absence of clear language to that purport, that Congress intended to disregard the requirements of a treaty with a foreign government, or to abrogate any of its clauses. At the same time, an act of Congress must be construed according to its manifest intent, and, so far as the courts are concerned, must be enforced. A treaty is in nature a contract between two nations, and by writers on public law is generally so treated, and not as having of itself the force of a legislative act. The Constitution of the United States, however, places both treaties and laws made in pursuance thereof in the same category and declares them to be the supreme law of the land. It does not give to either a paramount authority over the other. So far as a treaty operates by its own force without legislation, it is to be regarded by the courts as equivalent to a legislative act, but nothing further. If the subject to which it relates be one upon which Congress can also act, that body may modify its provisions or supersede them entirely. The immigration of foreigners to the United States and the conditions upon which they shall be permitted to remain are appropriate subjects of legislation as well as of treaty stipulation. No treaty can deprive Congress of its power in that respect. As said by Mr. Justice Curtis in Taylor vs. Morton: Inasmuch as treaties must continue as part of our municipal law, be obeyed by the people, applied by the judiciary, and executed by the President while they continue unrepealed, and inasmuch as the power of repealing these municipal laws must reside somewhere, and nobody other than Congress possesses it, then legislative power is applicable to such laws whenever they relate to subjects which the Constitution has placed under that legislative power. (2 Curtis C. C. Reports, 459.)

IS THE TREATY PERNICIOUS TO THE STATE, PREJUDICIAL TO ITS BEST INTERESTS, AND SHOULD IT BE ABROGATED?

The power of Congress, therefore, to abrogate these treaties being beyond question the next proposition to which I desire to attract attention is this: Do the admitted facts, read and known by all men, either demand or justify its exercise in the manner proposed by this bill? I insist, without fear of successful contradiction, that they not only justify but imperatively demand it. And in this connection I concede that the abrogation of a treaty with a foreign power by Congressional enactment should never be attempted, much less consummated, except for the gravest, most satisfactory, and conclusive reasons. But if from its inception it has been, or has for any reason since become, either contrary to the fundamental law, prejudicial to the state, or in its operation or effect pernicious to the commonwealth, and in its tendencies violative of the public peace or subversive of public justice, then no higher duty could possibly devolve on the American Congress than that of striking it down and wiping it out, either on account of its illegality or because it was from its inception, or has become, a vicious enemy of the state. Indeed, writers on international law agree in the declaration that a treaty that is prejudicial or pernicious to the state is absolutely void, just as a treaty is that is in conflict with the fundamental law. Vattel, in his Laws of Nations, section 228, in discussing this subject, says:

Every treaty prejudicial to the state or contrary to her fundamental laws being in its own nature void, the oath that may have been added to such treaty is void likewise and falls to the ground together with the covenant which it was intended to confirm.

And continuing further he says:

A treaty pernicious to the state is null and not at all obligatory.

Though a simple injury or disadvantage in a treaty is not sufficient to render it invalid, the case is not the same with those inconveniences that lead to the ruin of the state.

While Grotius, the great author of international law, states the following rule:

The natural law, by which every nation is bound to maintain its own existence, is not abdicated by treaty.

In this connection I shall assume that it is conceded by over 95 per cent. of all intelligent, reasoning men of mature years in the United States who have given to this subject any consideration, whatever may be their opinion as to the abstract right of the proposition as to whether their coming should be absolutely excluded by law, that the presence of Chinese in this country is an evil colossal in character, insidious in its operations, pernicious in effect, provocative of dissension and strife, the corrupter of public and private morals, a blight upon American labor, an obstruction to the rightful demands of honest toil, a disturber of the public peace, a restraint on desirable European immigration, a common enemy of the toiling millions of our land, a gradually and rapidly expanding and fearful menace to the best interests of our Republic, and a poisonous cup to the lips of Christian civilization.

Whatever may be the sentiment on this subject east of the Rocky Mountains where the shadows of this great scourge have as yet comparatively so lightly fallen, there is among the people west of the Rocky Mountains but one sentiment, but one mind, but one judgment, on this great and all-absorbing question, if we may except an occasional mercenary journal whose venal proprietors attach more value to the patronage of the Chinese six companies than they do to the rights of the masses of the people or the best interests of the State, or an occasional corporation whose interest is to degrade labor, cheapen the price of honest toil, and obtain the services of the laboring man at the lowest possible price.

As bearing upon this question of unanimity of opinion on the Pacific coast in opposition to Chinese immigration, it may be well to remember that six years ago, through the action of the Legislature of the State of California, the question was submitted to a vote of the people of that State. The whole vote cast was 155,521—a full vote. Of these, 154,638 were cast in opposition to Chinese immigration, while only 883 votes were cast in favor of it. And it is an unquestionable fact that public opinion on this question in the infected districts—and by this is meant the whole Pacific coast, including, as I believe, also the State of Colorado and the Territories of New Mexico, Wyoming, Montana, and Dakota—has ever since been becoming more solidified, more robust, more aggressive, and is now more determined and emphatic than ever before.

To-day there is but one voice on the Pacific coast on this question, coming alike from the field and the workshop, the bench and the bar, the rostrum and the pulpit, while the press, irrespective of party, with but an occasional exception as stated, is indefatigable and able not only in its attacks on the dreadful invasion but also in insisting that the real remedy is that proposed by the bill I have presented. As evidence of my statement in this regard, I attract attention to the following editorials and extracts from some of the leading journals of San Francisco, that have fallen under my notice the past few days.

I find in the San Francisco Evening Post of the 15th instant the following report of a pulpit discourse recently delivered in that city by the celebrated Congregational divine, Rev. Dr. Barrows:

At the First Congregational church last evening Rev. C. D. Barrows, the pastor, delivered a strong anti-Chinese sermon, in which he favored adopting any legal measure for expelling the Mongolian from this country. He said the time had come when the pulpit could no longer be silent, but must show equal interest with the press in affairs of this character. Self-protection was always justifiable, and if so in individuals why not in communities. Invasion, he remarked, was not immigration. If one invites a stranger to share a meal, and he proposes not only to take his portion, but that of the family and turn them out of doors, should the host submit? There was no question that the Chinese were usurping our rights and the laws human and divine entitled us to protect ourselves. The speaker declared that justice must not be forgotten, and defied the philosopher or missionary to prove by the Bible that there was any justice in the present state of affairs. The Chinese should be removed in accordance with justice, and there should be no more such immigration. Religious people made a great mistake when they thought that the only thing to do with the Chinese here is to Christianize them. In conclusion he stated that there was a necessity to readjust the national policy, and that we must make our country one of reunited States, and not the home of vagabonds.

The Evening Post comments editorially in the same issue, as follows:

Two weeks ago Rev. John Gray preached in the same strain at the Episcopal Church of the Advent. Neither of the reverend gentlemen said anything novel upon the theme which engaged his eloquence—for indeed, no one can say anything new upon so well worn a subject—but the fact that two clergymen, belonging to denominations so respectable, numerous and influential, should seize the present occasion to speak out so boldly and intelligently upon the Chinese question is noteworthy and gratifying. There has been a great advance within the past ten years in the position of the Pacific coast pulpit on this subject. Time was when here, as elsewhere throughout the country, it was thought that the pro-Chinese view was necessarily the Christian view. The argument ran thus: As it is the duty of Christians to convert the heathen, everything that facilitates this work is to be encouraged; Chinese who are brought to this country come directly under Christian influences—therefore, Chinese immigration should be approved. Long experience has shown, however, that it is no easier to convert the Chinaman here than on his native soil, and it has also become painfully apparent that whatever benefit, spiritual or other, which the Chinese may derive from being in America, nobody else gains any permanent advantage. It has been seen that the presence of the Chinese means poverty, suffering, and moral and religious blight to many of our own race.

The church view of the Chinese question has, therefore, broadened so as to take in the souls of white as well as of Mongolians, and the result is that many clergymen are now among the most earnest advocates of exclusion. The religious press of the coast is almost as outspoken as the secular in its antagonism to coolyism. Of late the Occident, the Presbyterian organ, has been doing good missionary work in enlightening its pious contemporaries of the East as to the evils, material and spiritual, which accompany the advent of the picturesque heathen from Asia into American communities. It is significant of the changed attitude of the church that the anti-Chinese convention held recently at San José selected a Baptist clergyman of that city as its agent and representative to travel through the State and organize anti-cooly clubs.

How can our esteemed contemporaries of the East reconcile these facts with their theory that hostility to the Chinese is confined on the Pacific coast to t. e ignorant and the vicious? We should like to see the sermons of Dr. Barrows and Rev. Mr. Gray printed in pamphlet form and sent to every newspaper office in the Union—especially to every religious newspaper office.

The San Francisco Evening Post in its issue of the 12th instant, in referring to the introduction of the bill now under discussion, speaks editorially as follows:

THE MITCHELL BILL.

Senator MITCHELL, of Oregon, has introduced a Chinese bill of a much more thorough character than any that has yet been offered by a responsible statesman. It abrogates all existing treaties with China, so far as they hamper the United States in dealing with immigration; forbids the entry of any Chinese persons except government officials and their servants; provides punishment for any master of a vessel who brings Chinese in violation of the law; prohibits the naturalization of Chinese, and makes due provision for the execution of the act. No chance is left for the courts to nullify the law. The prohibition of immigration, with the one exception named, is absolute. In express terms, it applies to all persons of Chinese race, whether subjects of the Chinese Empire or not. The amiable witness, who appears with mechanical regularity to swear that the petitioner once lived on "Dupon'stlee'," would, under this measure, find his occupation gone, for previous residence is not recognized by the bill.

As to the justice of this proposed act there can not be two opinions on the Pacific coast. It is precisely what the Post has been recommending for months, and what will have to come, sooner or later.

The Daily Evening Bulletin of the same issue said, among other things in its leading editorial, the following:

SENATOR MITCHELL'S PROPOSITION.

Senator MITCHELL, of Oregon, has introduced a bill in the Senate to abrogate all treaties which give the Chinese the right to enter this country and then effectually exclude them. There is not much doubt but that is a step which will have to be taken sooner or later. The movement against the coolies which is now so general throughout the Pacific coast goes by different names. As a matter of fact it is merely a popular effort more determined than anything that has yet been attempted to shake off Mongolianism. Its object is nothing more than the full and complete re-Americanization of the Pacific States and Territories, which are about the only areas not well filled up in the United States at this time. It might as well be understood by all those who gave any thought to the subject, East or West, that this movement is not going to come to a halt, or that there is not going to be a reaction of any consequence. The conflict is as irrepressible as that between free and slave labor formerly in the South. It will proceed until the only logical solution possible under the circumstances is reached—that is to say, the absolute, complete, and eternal exclusion of the servile and disturbing Chinese element. If there is not legislation wise and broad to facilitate and guide the movement, it will, before long, assume another more ultra and less manageable form.

To Senator MITCHELL's proposition, therefore, Congress will in time have to come. No doubt the wisest thing to do is to accept and enforce it now.

The San Francisco Morning Call of the 13th instant said editorially in reference to this question and this particular measure:

MITCHELL'S ANTI-CHINESE BILL.

Senator MITCHELL has begun where other anti-Chinese legislators will end. The present Congress may not be prepared for the bill Mr. MITCHELL has presented, but the next Congress will be. The people of the United States appear to have made up their minds that Chinese immigration must be stopped, the only question now being as to the necessity of an act of legislation which abrogates existing treaties. The Mitchell bill will be opposed in Congress on the ground that it is a discourtesy to the State Department to give notice of the abrogation of a treaty through Congressional action. It will be held by some that the State Department should exhaust diplomatic resources in the effort to obtain such a treaty as we want before Congress shall declare a treaty abrogated. It seems to us, however, that time enough has been wasted in waiting for the State Department to act. There is much reason to doubt if that Department is intensely interested in keeping Chinese out of the country. It is certain that the Treasury Department has construed the present law to admit Chinese in transit without assuming the duty of ascertaining if the Chinese so admitted left the country as they reported their intention to do.

In various ways the Departments have done much to render the present law ineffective. There is some excuse, in consequence, if Congress, representing the people, takes the task of getting rid of Chinese into its own hands. Nine years ago, in the early part of Mr. Hayes's administration, an exclusion law was passed which did not pretend to conform to existing treaties. The President vetoed it on the ground that it would be discourteous to China to announce through Congress the abrogation of a treaty. Under the stimulant of this Congressional act the State Department set its intellectual forces at work, and in the course of time the treaty of 1880 was agreed upon. By that treaty we agreed to allow all Chinese then in the country to go and come at pleasure. The go-and-come clause in the treaty has proved fatal to its usefulness. The "go" was all right, but the "come" was a mistake. Senator MITCHELL's bill eliminates the word "come" wherever it occurs. The facilities for going are not in the least impaired, but we do not want any one Chinaman to go but once. The Call has frequently expressed the belief that the present act might be made effective by literal construction and rigid enforcement.

But the courts say that literal construction violates the spirit of the treaty. Rather than violate the spirit of the treaty the courts have so construed the act that it serves but little purpose. It increases the cost of landing Chinese in the country, but it does not apparently materially diminish the number landed. Now, if we must disregard the treaty, let us do so in an open and manly way. Let us say to the Chinese Government that on and after a certain date no Chinese laborers will be allowed to land in the United States. The stupendous folly of permitting a Chinaman to return and repeat his raid should be openly renounced. Provision can be made for the migration of recognized merchants whose business requires an occasional trip to China. But when a Chinese laborer goes he should be denied the privilege to return. The Call favors all legislation which will strengthen the present law. If the Morrow bill can be passed and the Mitchell bill can not, let us have the Morrow bill. If it does not work better than the present law, Congress will be ready for the Mitchell bill before its fiftieth session expires.

The Call, in another recent editorial, said:

MAKE IT TIGHT.

A Washington dispatch says it is thought that all the anti-Chinese legislation the Pacific coast desires will be conceded by Congress. The anti-Chinese legislation which the Pacific coast especially desires is an enactment which will keep Chinese out of the country. Our experience convinces us that this can only be done by the enactment of a law forbidding Chinese laborers to return at all. When they go let them stay. So long as we undertake to provide for the return of the Chinese laborers, so long will fresh Chinese be sent in the place of those departed. We do not ignore the provision in the last treaty which allows Chinese then in the country to go and come of their own accord. It is, however, within the constitutional power of Congress to notify the Chinese Government that this provision of the treaty can not be observed without abandonment of the purpose for which the treaty was made. We have tried during four years a restriction law which carefully observed the provisions of the treaty. Between Department decisions and judicial decisions, all intended to carry out the spirit as well as the letter of the treaty, this law has been made ineffective. We now want a law that can not be construed away. The bill Representative MORROW has introduced limits the time within which a Chinese laborer may remain in China without forfeiting the right to return to two years. This is a disregard of the treaty, which makes no limit at all. An air-tight and water-proof Chinese exclusion law is what the Pacific coast now desires.

The Chronicle, in discussing the pending bill editorially, said:

He [MITCHELL] has gone further than the most strenuous opponents of the Chinese have thus far gone, but it is just as well for Congress to face it now. MITCHELL will doubtless furnish reasons to justify the legislation he proposes, and show that the trade with China is not worth considering.

But the San Francisco Daily Evening Bulletin, returning to the subject in its issue of the 15th, publishes the following editorial under the head of

THE RISING TIDE OF PUBLIC OPINION.

If Senator MITCHELL's bill, with some modifications, or any other bill having a like purpose in view, can be passed, the Chinese question will be solved for all time. That bill rises fully to the gravity of the case. If the question of our relations with China were broadly and ably presented, there is not much doubt that his proposition will become the law of the land. Mr. MORROW's bill was introduced early in the session. It went as far as it was thought it was possible to go at that time. But since then the Chinese question has undergone an entire change on the Pacific coast. One whole stage in the natural process of its solution has been jumped over. There was no one who favored MORROW's bill who did not know that at some future time some other and more ultra measure would have to be adopted. By the act of the people in every city and town of importance on the whole coast the question has been advanced one step on the Calendar, so to speak.

Revolutions never go backward. A social, moral, industrial, hygienic, financial, and ethnological revolution is now in progress in California and the other States and Territories of the Pacific. The general and, in many respects, lawful uprising of our people has stripped the question of the falsehoods by which it was surrounded. It is not the revolt of one class against another, however justifiable, but of a unanimous people determined to prevent the further defilement of this fair land by a heathen horde. Is is Americanism asserting itself against the debased and servile Mongolism of Asia. For the time being the Pacific coast is fighting on the forepost of civilization. The movement is one which will occupy a greater space in history than the small souls who are now seeking to dwarf or divert it for gain imagine possible. It will rank second in the great moral and philanthropic movements of the epoch. The overthrow of black slavery was the first. The extinction of the more subtle Coolyism of the present day is the second.

Senator MITCHELL's bill is necessarily more in accord with the rising tide of popular determination to extirpate the Chinese evil once for all than any previous measure. There ought, in the present condition of things, to be no trouble about accepting it. There is no reciprocity at all in our dealings with China. We have received no reciprocal advantages. The case can be summed up in a few words: We enjoy no more rights in China than any other civilized nation; but our country alone has been opened up for the traffic of the man-dealers of Canton. That traffic is openly carried on with Cuba, Brazil, and Asia and is sanctioned by treaty. Here it is cloaked and disguised because our laws forbid forced labor. Some people do not believe that the Chinese are held to service and labor in the United States because they do not see them driven about in gangs.

The chains which bind these slaves are invisible. They were forged out of their religion and their civil polity. The relatives of the Chinese peon are mortgaged at his home for the faithful performance of his contract. If he fail they are sold into slavery. He goes about apparently as a freeman, but his acts show the collar on his neck. Expensive lawyers are hired to represent Coolies in the efforts to evade the restriction law, but in nothing else. Coolies move in obedience to orders issued by a central authority. They can not leave the country without the permission of their owners. If they attempt to do so they are removed from the steamer under trumped-up charges of felony. By cutting the Gordian knot as proposed by Senator MITCHELL we bring this slave incursion to an end. There is no reason to believe that such a summary method of proceeding will result in the commercial loss of any kind. Even if it did, every consideration of patriotism, morals, philanthropy, and civilization would require that the sacrifice should be made. But China has too good a thing in the trade with the United States to relinquish it. Besides, we are masters of the situation. By discriminating duties on tea and silk we can build up Japan at the expense of China.

Nor is there any necessity for diplomatic delay. No nation is bound to continue a treaty that is working it a constant and manifest injury. Great Britain did not ask permission when it modified by act of Parliament the extradition treaty which it had with us. It was enough for it that, in its opinion, that treaty was doing violence to some of the principles upon which its government was founded. No permanent, satisfactory arrangement can be made whereby certain classes of a people of whom we know but little, and of whose language we are all ignorant, are to be admitted and certain others excluded. The exigencies of the Burlingame Treaty, when the object was to adhere to the letter of that one-sided document, required that some such arrangement should be set up, but for the reasons stated it can never be made to work. There will always be fraud and imposition in the administration of any law of that kind. It is by far preferable that an end should be made of the whole business right off. The Chinese can not be admitted to this country. There are millions of them standing ready to overwhelm us if the gates are not finally and firmly shut.

But the sentiment expressed in these editorials and on the bill under discussion is not confined by any means to the Pacific coast, and as a sample I attract attention to the following editorial found in the Philadelphia Press in its issue of the 11th instant:

POTTERING WITH A GRAVE QUESTION.

The anti-Chinese outbreak at Seattle, Wash., is the first exhibition only of a hostility which has long been growing. During a year past there has been a manifest increase in the aversion to this class of immigrants on the Pacific Slope, and the determination to be rid of them is now much stronger than ever. A trial of nearly four years of the restriction act has shown that it is little better than a rope of sand as a bulwark against the Mongolians. The frauds that can be practiced under it are numerous, and the wily Chinese were not slow to find the loopholes and to take advantage of them. The knowledge of these facts has aroused the people of the Pacific Slope as they were never aroused before on the subject. Numerous meetings have been held to interchange opinions on the question, and two State conventions have been called to insure united action in dealing with the evil. One convention will assemble in Portland, Oreg., next Saturday, while the other will meet in San Francisco March 10.

These events ought to impress upon Congress the necessity for taking this matter into serious consideration at once. The legislation of the past has been mere pottering and was enacted evidently in the hope that the question would settle itself in time. This, however, it has not done, and to-day the situation is more grave than ever. The great shame of the whole business is that it has been viewed more in its political aspects than in any other light. As the great majority of the members of Congress reside on this side of the Rocky Mountains and have no personal knowledge of the subject, they have taken that view of it which was likely to benefit their party most. Meanwhile the evil has gone on increasing. Instead of diminishing under the restriction act, the number of Chinese is believed to have steadily increased. According to the census of 1880 there were 73,548 Mongolian immigrants in California, 9,472 in Oregon, 3,166 in Washington Territory, and 104,000 in the whole country. California now estimates its Chinese population at 75,000, and the other States and the Territories in that vicinity admit no decrease. The frauds practiced on the custom-house officials and the ease in crossing the British Columbia border will account for this increase.

It is evident that some other policy must be tried. It is unjust to one of the fairest portions of the country for the rest of the nation to sit by supinely and see its prosperity retarded, its labor demoralized, and its people contaminated and refuse relief.

It will no longer do, therefore, to urge here or elsewhere in all this broad land that it is the irresponsible hoodlum element of the West only that is inveighing against Chinese immigration and crying out against their infectious, demoralizing, and pernicious presence.

This cry, always unfounded in fact, has in the face of events past and now transpiring become obsolete. The voice of honest labor, the intelligent demand of vital industries, the piteous wail of indigent toil—struggling for life in the unequal and unfair contest of competitive trial with the servile labor of Asia, transplanted, unfortunately, as it has been in American soil with all its tragic train of degradation, its ruinous tendencies, its debasing practices, its revolting customs and nameless crimes, are practically a unit on this great question in diguifying the movement on the Pacific coast in opposition to the Chinese as one in the interest of the general welfare, the conservation of public peace, the preservation of domestic tranquillity, the unfettering of public and private justice, and the vindication of the rights of American labor on American soil.

In view of the fact that the discussions of this question in Congress during the past fifteen or twenty years, and of the investigations that have been made under the direction of the two Houses of Congress, and the reports that have from time to time been submitted, with volume after volume of accompanying testimony, whereby have been spread upon the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and before Congressional eyes evidence without limit and in its character overwhelming and conclusive, showing in all its horrid phases and in its real, abhorrent character the evil nature, the contaminating tendencies, and horrible results of Mongolian life and habits on American soil, it would seem superfluous to waste the time of the Senate in a repetition of the disgusting facts or in rehearsing the many arguments that have been made bearing upon this great question.

It is not a new question; the public mind is not in ignorance in reference to it; Congress is not unadvised; the executive and administrative departments of the Government can not be blind in view of the past and present disclosures, either as to the real state of the case or the gravity of the situation. And if the evidence and arguments heretofore submitted to Congress are in any respect wanting in verity or deficient in amplification or force, and surely they are not, they are to-day being strongly and emphatically supplemented, supported, and sustained by the scenes of riot and anarchy and dissension and bloodshed that have occurred during the past few months in Wyoming and California and Washington Territory and other sections of the Pacific coast, and all of which, however indefensible or unjustifiable they may be, and however untrue or unjust it would be to, in any manner, charge the responsibility upon the Knights of Labor or upon any other class of intelligent and respected workingmen, it is true that they may be traced directly to the fact that there is imbedded within the population of these districts an abnormal element, a foreign body, a non-assimilating mass, a hideous putrefaction, the absolute and continual tendency of which is to provoke dissension and strife and anarchy and bloodshed.

The presence of nearly or quite two hundred thousand Mongolians, coming from among the worst classes of the lowest order of Asiatic life, and planted amidst and intermingled with a home population of less than one and a half millions on the Pacific coast, is an indigestible substance in the stomach of the body-politic of these communities; it is a nauseating emetic, which the people of that coast have been compelled to swallow, dipped from the stagnant and sickening cesspools of Pagan filth, and until it is ejected and thrown out the life and character, and destiny of that people will rest under the shadow of an affliction infinitely worse than that suffered by the Egyptians from the divers curses to which they were subjected.

In reference to the recent disturbances in Washington Territory and in other portions of the West, while we may and do reprobate violence under whatever pretense evoked or however great the provocation, except in support of law and order, it will not do, nor will the facts sustain the assertion, to say that it is the hoodlum or tramp or irresponsible element that is engaged in peaceable and orderly manifestations of opposition to the Chinese on the Pacific coast. As honorable and intelligent and respectable and worthy a class of workingmen as ever honored themselves and their families in this country, or their race, by honest effort and honest toil, suffering as they are to-day in their individual persons and in their families from the deprivation of the means of subsistence from the cheap and degraded labor of these rice-eating swarms of Asiatic serfs who have crowded them unceremoniously from the pick, the shovel, the hod, the plane, and the bench; from the factory and the hotel, from the field and the railroad, from the canal and the mine, from the garden and the shop, from the fisheries and the ways of travel, from the streets and the restaurants, from the manufactories and other places and vocations whereby men by their daily toil provide for self and wife and children and home, and goaded to a wild and, I may say, not inexcusable desperation, rise up in their majesty as intelligent, independent, suffering, resolute men, and protest by vigorous word and determined action against the presence in their midst of an element that is to them destructive of the means of subsistence and life and an insurmountable obstruction against them in every avenue of honest employment and fair recompense.

Is it to be wondered at that under these circumstances there will at times, through the indiscretions of the less discreet and peacefully inclined, occur occasional conflicts requiring the interposition of the strong arm of the law? The greater wonder is that the patience of communities composed of intelligent and worthy native-born and naturalized American citizens, whose homes have been established on these Pacific shores, whose families are there, and whose dependence is exclusively upon the fruits of their daily toil, and whose means of livelihood are filched from them day by day and hour by hour by a homeless band of male pagans, to whom home and family and fireside and children and domesticity are entire strangers, does not give way to desperation and to high-handed and united effort to immolate and destroy these destroyers of their peace and happiness. That this is not done under circumstances of such intense aggravation and of such aggravated provocation is to the workingmen and working-women of the Pacific coast a crown of unspeakable glory, and it rightfully commends them and their interests to the favorable consideration and real sympathy not alone of Congress and the Executive but of the people of the entire nation.

As the public mind in this country has become so fully informed and thoroughly educated upon the general question as to the unadvisability of this character of immigration, and the public judgment is, as I believe, so firmly fixed, I have made no particular effort in what I have said to rehash the testimony bearing upon this question. I will, however, depart so far as to submit a quotatian from Bayard Taylor, with whose writings all are familiar, and whose long residence in China enabled him to speak with accuracy upon the subject. In his work on India, China, and Japan, published in 1855, he says:

It is my deliberate opinion that the Chinese are, morally, the most debased people on the face of the earth. Forms of vice, which in other countries are barely named, are in China so common that they excite no comment among the natives. They constitute the surface-level, and below them are deeps of depravity so shocking and horrible that their character can not even be hinted. There are some dark shadows in human nature which we naturally shrink from penetrating, and I made no attempt to collect information of this kind; but there was enough in the things which I could not avoid seeing and hearing—which are brought almost daily to the notice of every foreign resident—to inspire me with a powerful aversion to the Chinese race. Their touch is pollution; and, harsh as the opinion may seem, justice to our race demands that they should not be allowed to settle on our soil. Science may have lost something, but mankind has gained, by the exclusive policy which has governed China during the past centuries.

But as in my judgment there are no two opinions upon this question in this contry, it is but a waste of time and a useless performance to adduce further testimony upon this point.

THE BURLINGAME TREATY NOT ONLY IN ALL RESPECTS VALUELESS TO THE UNITED STATES COMMERCIALLY, BUT A STANDING CURSE.

But it has been said that we can not afford to break faith with China, we can not afford to surrender the great privileges that have accrued and are accruing to the United States by reason of the Burlingame treaty. In answer to this I unhesitatingly say that never in the history of national compacts, never before in the execution of treaties between governments was any nation so shamefully overreached, fooled, bamboozled, outwitted, and swindled as was the United States in the adoption of the Burlingame treaty. The truth is, in that bargain the United States absolutely got nothing worthy of the mention that it did not possess before, while many of its then existing rights and privileges were materially restricted and in consideration of which it made a grant, an unqualified concession to an idolatrous nation, to an Asiatic empire, the result of which, unless restrained, will ere many years cast a blight upon our nationality, a paralysis upon American labor, a blot upon our civilization, a mildew upon our progress, and become a serious stumbling block in the way of the advancement and prosperity of our Republic.

What rights, or privileges, or concessions, or powers, or advantages were given or granted to the United States by virtue of the provisions of the Burlingame treaty that we did not possess by virtue of our treaty with China of June, 1858? Let us inquire. In the first article of the Burlingame treaty China asserts that in making concessions to the citizens or subjects of foreign powers of the privileges of residing on certain tracts of land, or resorting to certain waters of that Empire for purposes of trade, the Emperor of China had not by prior treaty or by any means relinquished his right of eminent domain or dominion over the said land or waters; and it is stipulated that no such concession or grant shall be construed to give to any power or party which may be at war with or hostile to the United States the right to attack the citizens of the United States, or their property, within the said land or waters; and the United States is by this article prohibited from attacking the citizens or subjects of any power or party, or their property, with which they may be at war on any such tract of land or waters of the said empire; and the article then proceeds to absolutely and materially restrict the rights which the United States then enjoyed by stipulating that grants of land theretofore made to the United States or any of its citizens in China for the purpose of trade or commerce should in no event be construed to divest the Chinese authorities of their rights of jurisdiction over persons and property within said tracts of land, except so far as that right may have been expressly relinquished by treaty. The first article of the Burlingame treaty, therefore, so far from granting any new rights or privileges, is but a restriction on the rights and privileges of the United States and their citizens in China which they possessed before.

The same may be said of the second article, as it stipulates that any privilege or immunity in respect to trade or navigation with the Chinese dominions which may not have been stipulated for by treaty shall be subject to the discretion of the Chinese Government, and may be regulated by it accordingly.

The third article is also a concession to the Chinese Government, for which we receive nothing. It stipulates that the Empire of China shall have the right to appoint consuls at the ports of the United States, who shall enjoy the same privileges and immunities as those which are enjoyed by public law and treaty in the United States by the consuls of Great Britain and Russia, or either of them.

Article IV concedes naught that we did not possess under the treaty of 1858, save and except it is stipulated that the sepulture of our dead shall be held in respect and free from disturbance or profanation, for which we extend the same courtesies.

The stipulation in reference to the exemption of citizens of the United States in China from disability or persecution on account of their religious faith, and the enjoyment of liberty of conscience, are but little, if indeed anything, more than an elaboration of concessions then enjoyed by the United States under the treaty of 1858, while all these rights, privileges, and protections are thrown around Chinese subjects in the United States.

Article 5 of course concedes nothing to the United States, while the United States by its provisions, in an hour of thoughtlessness on the part of the great premier, Mr. Seward, and of the Executive and the Senate, and I might say of the entire people of the whole nation, while boasting of the protection they pretend to give to American labor and American interests, threw open wide the doors of the nation and bid welcome to our midst at their pleasure the countless millions of yellow idolaters of the Celestial Empire.

Article 6 is an elaboration and guarantee of the rights and privileges acceded to Chinese subjects in the United States by article 5 of the treaty.

But what do we get by article 7? The enormously valuable concession that citizens of the United States shall enjoy all the privileges of the public educational institutions under the control of the Government of China enjoyed by citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, and the right upon their part to freely establish and maintain schools within the Empire of China at those places where foreigners are by treaty permitted to reside; while all these privileges are extended to Chinese subjects in the United States. Wondrous concession, that the civilization of free enlightened America, the outgrowth of popular and scientific education and of Christianity, should be graciously admitted to the sacred educational temples of the descendants of Confucius in a land where popular education is unknown, where the sciences are strangers, and Christianity is unheard of!

And now having traveled through each and every article of the treaty, except the last, without being able to discover a single solitary new grant or concession to the United States or its citizens that is or ever has been or ever can be worth so much as a farthing, we come to consider the last article in the treaty to find a second Chinese wall more formidable than that which held the Tartars at bay for over fourteen centuries, erected with our consent, builded in part with our own hands around the Chinese Empire and all its vast territory, so broad and firm and high as to forever exclude from whatever fields of enterprise that country may possess all American enterprise, capital, and labor.

The United States—

Says this article—

do hereby disclaim and disavow any intention or right to intervene in the domestic administration of China in regard to the construction of railroads, telegraphs, or other material or internal improvements.

And again:

On the other hand, his majesty, the Emperor of China, reserves to himself the right to decide the time and manner and circumstance to introduce such improvements within his dominions; and it is further stipulated that whenever his Imperial Majesty shall determine to construct or cause to be constructed works of the character mentioned within the empire, the United States shall, on demand of the Emperor of China, designate and authorize suitable engineers to superintend and carry on the work for China, and will recommend to other nations that they respond to the request of China in that regard in like manner.

The Daily Evening Bulletin of San Francisco, in discussing this question and suggesting the advisability of abrogating the Burlingame treaty, in a recent issue of that paper made the following statement:

When the argument comes up on the latter point it will not be difficult to demonstrate that in that compact we gave everything and got nothing whatever in return. It would be impossible to find an instance in which a nation was more grossly overreached than we were on that occasion. The instrument will be searched in vain for any right or privilege conceded to Americans which all other foreigners do not enjoy. The history of diplomacy does not reveal another instance of a bargain so entirely one-sided.

It is therefore evident that were the Burlingame treaty and the supplementary treaty of 1880 wiped out of existence to-morrow in toto our interests in China would not be damaged to any material extent whatever, while on the other hand results incalculable in their value would inure to the benefit of the United States. The objection that our commerce with China would suffer and great commercial interests be stricken down by the abrogation of this treaty is not well-founded. It is based upon an entire misconception of the facts; it is founded in an erroneous impression of the benefits alleged to have been conferred upon this country by the Burlingame treaty; it is made in ignorance of the real state of facts in reference to our trade with China. China has too much at stake, too many interests to subserve to close her ports against American commerce. Her exports to the United States are nearly 300 per cent. more in value per annum than the value of our exports to China.

I hold in my hand a statistical statement showing the kind, qualities, and values of the imports into the United States from, and the exports of the United States to, China during the year ending June 30, 1885, which I ask the permission of the Senate to incorporate in my remarks without stopping to read it.

From this statement, it will be seen that the whole amount of merchandise imported from China to the United States during this period amounted in value to the sum of $16,292,169, of which amount only about one-fourth, or $4,241,401, was subject to duty, the balance being on the free-list; while the sum total of our exports to China on domestic commodities during the same time was $6,396,178, our total exports of foreign merchandise but $322, making our total exports $6,396,500.

The port of San Francisco alone exported merchandise to all foreign countries during the year ending June 30, 1885, more than six times the amount in value than did all the ports of the United States, San Francisco included, export to China during the same period, her exports of merchandise for that year being $38,115,624, while the port of Portland, Oreg., the next nearest port of consequence to China, if we may except Astoria, Oreg., exported in all that year merchandise within $2,000,000 of the amount sent to China by all the ports of the United States, San Francisco and Portland included.

Nor has our export trade with China increased, but on the contrary largely decreased, during the past few years under the operation of the Burlingame treaty. Our total exports to China for the year ending June 30, 1885, were less by nearly $500,000 than they were seven years ago. In that year, ending June 30, 1878, they were $6,867,255, and our exports to China during the year ending June 30, 1885, were less by $1,968,036 than they were in 1881, and, small as it is, less than double that when the Burlingame treaty was ratified. But, not only so, it requires a drain of our gold and silver of nearly $10,000,000 annually to square our account with China, to say nothing of the immense drain of many millions annually sent out of the country through the operation of the Chinese.

Recurring to the immense drain of specie from our country involved in this trade, I submit the following statement from the Bureau of Statistics, Treasury Department, showing the value of the foreign trade with China and Hong-Kong and our annual total exports of gold and silver to China during the past fifteen years.

But another consideration of immense importance must not be lost sight of in the consideration of this question. Prior to the existence of the Burlingame treaty Americans on the Pacific coast and elsewhere within the limits of the United States carried on whatever trade we had with China and received the benefit of it. How is it to-day? Over 95 per cent. of the whole trade is monopolized and carried on by Chinese. The chimera, therefore, in reference to our great commerce with China and its alleged immense importance to this country cannot delude much longer, and when put in the balance against the great evils that are resulting to this country and our people from the presence of the Chinese, it should not be considered for one moment, even though the effect of the abrogation of the treaty might be to deprive us wholly of this trade, which, as I have endeavored to show, it most certainly will not; for, even conceding the importance of that trade and the desirability of retaining it, China will never close her ports against it, treaty or no treaty. The advantages are too greatly in her favor; the profits are all on her side of the ledger. The benefits inuring from it are in favor of China and not of the United States.

With Great Britain her account stands quite differently. England is not compelled to go down in her exchequer every year to the tune of many millions as have we in order to settle a balance of trade with China. Her opium from India alone very nearly pays for the Chinese products purchased by her.

It was proclaimed with a flourish of trumpets when the Burlingame treaty was consummated that a new market for our surplus wheat was to be opened up to the producers of this country; that the rice-eating millions of China would at once become a bread-eating people. But what is the result? Eighteen years have passed away and our annual total exports of breadstuffs to China, including wheat and flour, is of the value of less than $40,000, the exact amount for the year ending June 30, 1885, being $35,734—a mere bagatelle. And so with our provisions, comprising meats and dairy products; $35,977 in value is the sum of all they purchased from us in the last year.

In fact, if we may except the two products of uncolored cotton manufactures, the value of our exports of which to China during the past year was $3,400,339, or considerably over one-half of all our exports to that country, and refined petroleum, amounting to $1,455,234, our export trade with China amounts to absolutely nothing; while from her free list she, through her importations, is permitted to enter into competition with our producers of hides and skins, chemicals, drugs, and dyes, unmanufactured rare woods, hair, and other of our productions.

From this it will be seen we have in that time sent to China in gold and silver to balance our account $131,134,815. In the four years and seven months ending July 31, 1879, we exported from San Francisco alone, to China, specie to the amount of $49,848,918. This immense sum of over $131,000,000 in gold and silver is in small part the tax that has been levied on the white labor of the Pacific coast and handed over to the Mongols of Asia. But to this add not less than from $75,000 to $100,000 per day that is daily being absorbed by the laboring Chinese of the Pacific coast, and only a very small fraction of which finds its way back into American life and industries, and the balance of which, amounting to untold millions, is sent out of the country, and then some adequate conception may be had of the enormously bad bargain this country struck with China when the Burlingame treaty was made.

RESTRICTION ACTS.

Restriction acts have in the past proven mere delusions and snares. They do not meet the evil, but rather aggravate it by offering opportunities for their evasion through the crafty practices, fraudulent devices, and bold perjury of the criminal Chinese. They have only been placed on the statute-book to be evaded through perjury, chicanery, and fraud, and to have their efficiency destroyed by judicial and departmental construction in strained efforts to harmonize their provisions with the letter and spirit of the treaties.

This bill, unlike our restriction acts and proposed acts, is not elastic; it is absolutely iron-clad; it leaves nothing to construction; it is conclusive. It is not open to the objection of being liable to have its vitality sapped or its efficiency destroyed by judicial or departmental decision. No delicate questions as to conflict between act and treaty are left open for construction or determination by either court or department; all questions as to the power of consuls to issue certificates; all issues as to their fraudulent character; all inquiries, judicial or otherwise, into the identity of the hundreds of Chinese who come regularly to our ports under claim that they have formerly resided here and are therefore under the restriction acts entitled to return, whose names are not only idem sonans as a rule but in person facies omnibus una, are wholly dispensed with. The premium held out by mere restriction acts to professional perjurers is withdrawn. The opportunity for the exercise of Chinese cunning, Mongolian chicanery, and Pagan prostitution of the forms of law to the base purposes of eluding the requirements of law, is forever taken away.

Restriction acts simply apply the knife in a rather delicate manner to some of the outer branches of the deadly upas tree, while the bill under consideration lays the ax with a determined and vigorous hand at all of its poisonous roots. Restriction merely is a harmless anodyne applied with a delicate brush to an incurable ulcer; prohibition is the surgeon's knife thrust vigorously beneath the festering sore. The one is simply boxing and fencing with an athletic giant-evil that is making rapid strides toward Mongolianizing the Pacific coast; the other is grasping that evil boldly and energetically and defiantly, but yet constitutionally, by the throat and downing it without form or ceremony. The one is a pretense and a fraud in that it assumes to be legislation in pursuance of treaty stipulations, when in fact it is in violation of them, while the other proclaims to the world that the treaty itself is a fraud upon American labor, on public justice, on public and private morality, and on American civilization, and as such it has become the duty of Congress to brush it aside. Our past experience on this subject has proven that restrictive legislation on this subject does not restrict, but rather, under its operation, the number of Chinese in this country is augmented. While the census of 1880 showed but about 105,000 Chinese all told in this country, the number now here, as ascertained by careful estimates in the various localities occupied, is not less than from 180,000 to 200,000.

If, therefore, this class of immigration is so objectionable as we all concede it to be, if it is so fraught with disaster to the best interests of our Republic and people, if its effect is so baneful, as we claim, on American labor, subordinating it to that of the cooly labor of Asia, if it is such a blight on public and private morals through its squalidness, wretchedness, and crimes; through its drain on the vitalizing currents of our financial, physical, and moral life; through the operation of all its vile instrumentalities, such as opium dens, houses of prostitution, and other snares of virtue and haunts of vice it has already established in startling numbers, not only in every city and town of the Pacific coast, but also in every city of any magnitude throughout the entire land; if, as is susceptible of abundant and conclusive proof, this immigration has transplanted from the hot-beds of moral and physical corruption in the depths of Asia new, detested, and nameless crimes, whose very touch is pollution, whose mention is forbidden in this presence, and whose infection is moral and physical death; and if again no great interest of trade or commerce is to be protected by withholding the blow necessary to its destruction, then why should Congress hesitate to rise at once, and without further delay, to the demands of the hour, and in the exercise of its constitutional power strike with unsparing hand a death-blow at the vitals of American civilization's direst foe? To hesitate in the presence of such a danger is to parley with the assassin and treat with the corrupting invader of home and fireside. It is to fire blank cartridges when full-weighted leaden bullets are demanded.

The conflict that is being waged on this subject of the Asiatic occupation of this country is as irrepressible as the conflict that resulted in the overthrow of human slavery. It is a conflict for supremacy on American soil between intelligent, enlightened, and honest American labor and the cheap and degraded labor of the lowest order of the Mongol; a conflict between morality and vice, order and anarchy, Americanism and Asianism; a conflict between civilization and heathenism, Christianity and paganism; a conflict between two opposing forces in all essential particulars non-assimilating and repellant when considered in the relation of the one to the other; and the one or the other of which must and will ultimately and necessarily be driven to the wall; nor does it require any peculiar prescience to determine the result of the contest, if the United States Government either stands supinely by and does nothing, or, what is but little more effective for good, simply attacks the advancing army of invaders with wooden swords and paper bullets under pretense of conforming to treaty stipulations and sustaining diplomatic relations.

Public opinion, when so nearly unanimous as it is on this subject, is not often wrong in this country and this age, and it is to-day, in a voice whose echo shall startle the empire and command the respect and approval of all civilized nations, demanding of Congress the enactment of a prohibitory law that will at once and forever end this great controversy and strangle this arch enemy of free labor, of law, order, tranquillity, and civilization itself.

I now move a reference of the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations for their consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. HALE. I now rise to make the motion indicated by me at the beginning of the session to-day, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BECK. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BECK. I do not desire to debate it. I have no objection to an executive session, but I suppose the object is to consider a case from Maine that has been somewhat debated in committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is not in order to talk about the object of an executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BECK. I merely asked the Senator from Maine the object of his motion.

Mr. HALE. I should like to hear the Senator from Kentucky, although I presume he would have no right to proceed.

Mr. INGALLS. That can be stated after the doors are closed.

Mr. HALE. I am not going to refer to any particular thing, but I do not desire to go into executive session unless the object I have in going in can be accomplished; and if the Senator from Kentucky, who I know is interested in the same matter but perhaps upon the other side, has anything to say with reference to it that will oblige us to come again into legislative session, I desire that he should state it now rather than that we should go through the form of going in and coming out.

Mr. BECK. All I desire to say is that we shall save a great deal of time by not taking up the matter now when it can be done Monday as early as the Senator from Maine may desire, when I shall aid him to go into executive session. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] is absent to-day and many matters we desire to look at can be presented on Monday.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator say that he is not ready for an executive session?

Mr. BECK. I am not ready.

Mr. HALE. Upon that assurance of the Senator I can not insist on the motion, because I know well it would only result in going in and coming out. Therefore I will withdraw the motion, but with the understanding that on Monday early I shall expect the Senator's co-operation with me in securing an executive session.

Mr. BECK. I shall help the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. BLAIR. Regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] to the amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. The amendment and the amendment to the amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to add as a new section:

SEC. —. That the money that shall be appropriated in pursuance of this act for the purposes of education in the Territories shall be apportioned according to a census that shall be taken in each of the organized Territories, at the expense of the United States and under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, on or before the 1st day of June, 1886.

The amendment to the amendment is to substitute the following:

That the apportionment of the money that shall be appropriated in pursuance of this act for the purposes of education in the Territories shall be upon the basis of the illiteracy therein, as provided in section 2 of this act; but in determining the number of illiterates therein the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to receive and consider, in addition to the census returns of 1880, any evidence that may be submitted to him showing the number of illiterates in any such Territories and shall determine therefrom before the first distribution is made the amount to which such Territory is entitled.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to understand in just what form it is. Is the amendment of the Senator from Indiana a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. BLAIR. I think then it is an amendment that should be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is still open to amendment. If no further amendments be proposed——

Mr. PLUMB. I think some amendments have been proposed.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the amendment of which I gave notice yesterday.

Mr. BLAIR. There are other amendments which were offered earlier.

Mr. ALLISON. I offer the amendment now, to come in at the end of section 2.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa will be reported. There is no other amendment pending.

Mr. BLAIR. There are several amendments pending, if the clerks would state them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There are no other amendments pending in the sense that they have been offered. Notice has been given that several would be offered, but they are not pending. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 2:

And in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money paid in such State shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools in the proportion that the illiteracy of the white and colored persons aforesaid bear to each other, as shown by said census.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to modify my amendment by striking out in line 4 the words "such white and colored;" so as to read: "and paid out for the support of schools in the proportion that the illiteracy," &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator can modify his amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I will modify it in that way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read as modified.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money paid in such State shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of schools in the proportion that the illiteracy of the white and colored persons aforesaid bear to each other, as shown by said census.

Mr. BLAIR. Does the Senator from Iowa desire to take the floor on the amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not care to do so at this moment.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not understand as yet whether the Senator has modified his amendment by unanimous consent, or whether the amendment is under discussion as he originally offered it. I should like to ask the Senator how he understands that to be.

Mr. ALLISON. I leave it as I originally offered it for the present, so that the Senator may have an opportunity to debate it on that basis.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The modification is withdrawn.

Mr. BLAIR. Before the question is taken on the amendment I desire to offer a few observations upon it. It is in its nature, in its inevitable effect, the introduction into the provisions of the bill of a discrimination based upon race, as I understand it. It can have no other effect; and it seems to me it is a late day for the American Congress to adopt that class of legislation. The bill itself, careful all the way through, in all its provisions, excludes any such idea; and the bill itself is not one of recent origin, or one which has lacked careful and sharp criticism in the past. It is not here with its terms unstudied or its real meaning readily misunderstood.

I have had occasion several times to allude to the fact that the provisions of this bill, and especially its provisions in this regard, have undergone the close scrutiny not only of our friends upon the other side of the Chamber but upon this side of the Chamber, and never until the offering of this amendment has it been necessary that there should be any modification of them. The only legitimate effect of this amendment is to introduce an element of discord, to revive discussions which I supposed had become obsolete in this country, to arrest and arraign as against this bill constitutional difficulties, to raise questions as to whether the bill itself may not by the insertion of this provision become unconstitutional, and if there were no difficulty at all, it is calculated, in the practical administration of the act among the people where we hope it will be most useful, simply to occasion confusion, mischief, and possibly the entire destruction of the favorable operation of the law; and it seems to me there is on this side of the Chamber some misapprehension as to the nature of the basis of the distribution which is made use of in the bill, that of illiteracy, as to the portion which goes to the several States, and I would be delighted if more of the Senators who have this objection were present and would hear what is to be said in explanation of the position assumed in the bill and the views which were so entirely satisfactory to this side of the Chamber until now, but there are some here who have not before listened to what I have now to say, perhaps.

It should be borne in mind that the basis of distribution established in this bill, which was never objected to before in the Senate so far as I know—certainly the objection never was exhibited in the form of a vote so as to pass upon the record—the basis of distribution in this bill is illiteracy. It is not white illiteracy; it is not colored illiteracy; no money goes to any part of this country because the man who is to be benefited by it is white or because he is colored, nor because the child who is to receive the benefit of the operations of this bill is of one color or of another color. No dollar goes to the State of Mississippi because there are white illiterates there or because there are black illiterates there. Illiteracy is taken in its broadest sense, inclusive of all individuals who are illiterate, be they white or black; and there is no discrimination in regard to color by the adoption of the rule of the bill as to the distribution among the States. The illiteracy is not of one color or the other; but illiteracy of all is the basis.

It would be just as sensible to say that the provisions of this bill should be more largely favorable to illiterates who were only 5 feet high than to illiterates who were more than 5 feet high as to say that the provisions of this bill should be more favorable to the illiterates of one color than to those of another color. In the adoption of illiteracy as the basis of distribution there is no reference, as I said before, to the matter of color, and it is not properly to be charged against this bill that because in the State of Mississippi or in any other State there are more illiterates of the blacks, therefore the children of a particular color in that State should receive the larger benefit from the operation of the act. As I stated before, it would be just as reasonable to make a discrimination among illiterates upon their relative sizes or weights or any other arbitrary and non-essential distinctions that might exist as between them as individuals. The substance which is at the bottom of all this line discrimination, now offered as an amendment to this bill, disappears.

Now, a little further. Here is another objection which exists in the minds of some people. They say to us, "You distribute this money upon the basis of illiteracy and the illiterates in particular States are more of them blacks than whites." Therefore they reason that the amount which goes to the States is based or ought to be based on color, because more of the illiterates happen to be black than happen to be white. But that is not so. If every one of these illiterates were white precisely the same amount of money would go there, and would go there because it is illiteracy that is dangerous and it is illiteracy only that we are dealing with.

Suppose now, to reverse the condition of things, that in the North the illiteracy existed and in the South where they have this colored population they had a degree of intelligence such as we now have at the North, would you undertake to say, would it be claimed that the South, understanding the fact that she was more intelligent but had a larger number of negroes, people of the colored race, within her borders, should therefore receive the larger amount? On the other hand, although the illiterates were all white, under the rule of distribution adopted in the bill the money would go to the North if its people were thus illiterate; they would get the money instead of the South.

They tell us that the basis of distribution comprises all the illiterates, those who are of the school age and those who are over the school age; and so it does; and therefore they say that as you depend upon the aggregate illiteracy in all the States of persons over ten years of age, when you have distributed the money upon that basis to the State and it has gone into the State, it should be paid out in the State for the education of the illiterates on the same basis. But that is a non sequitur; it does not follow at all. It is an absurdity. This basis of illiteracy is only, as I explained in what I said the day before yesterday, an arbitrary method which we adopt because no other so good has been suggested to determine the basis of distribution from the national Treasury to the States; that is all. But when the money reaches the State, what is it to be paid out for? By the provisions of the bill, by the dictates of common sense, it is to be paid out to educate those who are within the ages when they can receive education. Simply because the money is distributed originally upon the basis of the illiteracy of the aged as well as the young, is it to be understood when the money is in the State it is to be applied to the illiterate who are there as such, regardless of age? By no means, for, of course, none of us understand, none of the very Senators who urge this objection will rise in their place and say the money should be thus distributed. If it is not to be thus distributed, what becomes of their objection that it should be applied in the State to illiterates because it goes to the State on that arbitrary basis of distribution?

The money being sent to the State, illiteracy having been assumed as a general measure for all, and the share of the State (which as I said the other day is based on the lack of education and its inability, by reason of poverty, to bear taxation to remove that illiteracy), the money being once in the State on that basis, it is to be paid out to educate those who ought to be educated, those whom the common schools can educate; it is no time in the day, no time in the century, no time in the history of mankind to say that a child is to receive more or less simply because he is of one or the other color, in this country at least. This amendment proposes to say that; that is the purpose of it; the money shall be paid out in such a way as to give the children of a certain color a larger proportion of the money than the children of another color get. That is the only effect of it, and I think it is entirely wrong.

Mr. President, there is another objection to this amendment. It proposes to distribute the money to schools and not to the individuals who may attend the schools. The measure of distribution is to existing schools and the schools that may exist, so that the effort to derive all that can be had on the part of the existing schools will tend to exhaust the moneys. A school that is established for three or six months, as the case may be, getting its money now, desiring to increase its facilities, to give additional advantages to the scholars who may be attending it, is directly and selfishly interested at once to prevent the establishment of any other schools.

The Senator's amendment says give it to the schools. The schools existing have the right to the whole of it by the amendment, and thus the existing schools are by the provisions of this amendment at once organized into a board to prevent the spread of any of the money beyond themselves. It has been already one hundred times stated in the debate, and never contradicted, that the great region beyond the schools that already exist is the greatest source of danger, and it is to that as yet unpenetrated region that we should endeavor to distribute this additional money so far as we can.

The amendment is pernicious in its practical operation by reason of the fact that it contemplates white and colored schools existing in one county and builds them up to oppose the distribution of any money beyond themselves. It prevents the spread of schools. If this were not on other grounds an objectionable amendment, there is that which is an insuperable objection. Time is short that I must not enlarge upon it any longer. I have indicated the objections.

While I am on my feet, as the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] thought it necessary last night to make part of his address the two-column article of Judge Tourgee, in which is discussed this same point, somewhat with the air of a master, of a gentleman who has said all that there is to be said and disposes of those who may have a little different opinion with him on this subject as though their opinions were of the most trifling account, I shall venture to go over this article with him and suggest as I go over it a few of the reasons of my dissent, and the dissent of the committee, and the dissent of the Senate, and, as far as I know, of the country generally with his views. I refer to the sense of the Senate as expressed at a former Congress. It must be remembered that the bill before the Senate now is precisely the same bill that passed the Senate in the Forty-eighth Congress. This is a lengthy article on the necessity of assistance to remove the illiteracy of the country, which is a very strong one, a repetition of arguments the writer has himself made on many occasions and which have often been made in this Chamber and elsewhere. Speaking of the educational bill he says—I read from the RECORD:

> The educational bill now before the Senate is a curious instance of the lack of political knowledge and sagacity on the part of legislators who merely jump at an idea without taking the trouble to investigate details.
> One would suppose that after spending three weeks on this matter in the last Congress the whole Senate might reasonably have been looked upon as tolerably diligent investigators, but, of course, their final action must necessarily disclose lack of intelligence on their part.
> So far as the matters herein referred to are concerned, it is identical with the Blair bill which passed the Senate at the last session of Congress and the Willis bill which was reported to the House, but failed to be reached on the Calendar. These measures are based on the following hypothesis:
> 1. That a sum of money be appropriated to each State for the cure of illiteracy—the amount assigned to each being estimated on the number of illiterates in each State, according to the census of 1880.

That, of course, is correct.

> 2. That the same shall be used by the respective States for the promotion of elementary education in the public schools, without distinction as to race.
> As a result about four-fifths of the fund will go to the Southern States, as it ought to do, in order to remove the overwhelming ignorance of both races in that region.

As a matter of fact he has overstated that. It is somewhat between two-thirds and three-fourths.

> The necessity for this is readily shown by the following tables, compiled from the census of 1880.

These tables have been printed already, and there is no fault to be found with the tables as far as they go. He selects, however, certain particular States, not including the whole of the Southern States, in order to make the showing for his views apparently as strong as possible.

> The extent of the peril arising from this may be seen by examining the following table.

By which he shows that in Virginia there were 430,352 illiterates, 40.6 per cent. of population, and so in several other States, the total in eight States of illiterates being 2,989,802, an average per cent. of illiteracy of 48.4. The average per cent. in the Northern States is figured out here as 8.5.

> The most important fact connected with the measure, however, is the relation it bears to the education of the two races. It should be borne in mind that in all the Southern States the schools for the two races are distinct, and the funds for their support are now distributed according to the number of each race in the separate school districts, or else according to the number of children of each race within the school ages, as prescribed by the laws of the respective States. Practically there is no difference in these standards; to distribute according to the number of children is in effect to distribute according to the proportion of the two races. So that, if a State have 1,000,000 whites and 500,000 blacks, the white schools will have twice as much money as the colored schools.

Then he makes this assertion:

> The bill in question requires the fund thereby appropriated to be distributed in the same manner as the respective school funds, though it is assigned to the States on the basis of illiteracy.

There is a very serious misstatement of fact. The bill provides that the money goes to the State which must, under the operation of the bill, be combined with the funds of the State, and however they may have been distributed hitherto, the whole must be so distributed hereafter as to secure equality of school privileges without regard to race or color. So this is a very pointed and absolute misstatement of the bill.

> According to the report of the House committee of the last Congress.

He goes on to show that the average amount going to each illiterate is $1.60, but it is not because he is a white illiterate or because he is a black illiterate but because he is an illiterate. He gets under the bill (the distribution of $10,000,000 being the basis assumed by the calculation) $1.60 because he is an illiterate, not because he is white or black. Making up another table of certain States, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana, he says:

> It will be seen that there were almost three times as many colored as white illiterates, and, considering the character of the appropriation and the fact that all the school-houses and educational equipment of the ante-war systems in those States are held by and for the use of the white race, it would seem as if good policy and common sense would demand that the remedy should be spread somewhat evenly upon the sore—that the colored schools should be benefited somewhat in proportion to the amount to be received by the State on account of colored illiteracy. The following tables will show what would actually occur under the provisions of the bill. See foregoing table for the number of white and colored illiterates in each State, &c.

And he says:

> Received on account of white illiterates, $1,182,406; paid on account of colored illiterates, $3,690,692.

There is where the gentleman is again entirely in error. There is not a dollar of this money received in the State of Mississippi or in any other State because of white illiteracy or because of black illiteracy, but the distribution is made to the States by reason of the fact of the actual illiteracy there. The modification now proposed in this bill is to the effect that the money shall go into these States in proportion, not to the illiteracy itself, but in proportion to the illiteracy of persons of a particular race, and having gone in that way it shall be applied to the illiterate children of that particular race. But does any man rise here and say that, in view of our actual duty as a nation, it is any more essential to the future peace of the country that the colored child who is of school age should be educated, than it is that the white child of school age who sits beside him and lives in the same community, and is to be a citizen of the same State and the same country in the future, should be educated? No, sir; and this effort is simply one to discriminate in favor of children of a certain color against other children of another color. He goes on and makes this statement:

> So that while each illiterate black and white alike will draw $1.60 from the national Treasury for the benefit of the State, each white illiterate will receive for his education in a white school several times the amount that will be applied to the education of the colored illiterate in the schools of his race.

Now, as a suggestion to this gentleman who criticises Congress and those interested in this bill with considerable freedom, as a suggestion to him which may probably admonish him that he has not thought too much on the subject, as he possibly might have done, I call the attention of the Senate to his statement that this money is to be applied in the States to the education of illiterates, the men of a hundred years of age and the women of a hundred years of age who are reckoned as illiterates in making up the basis of illiterates. When the $1.60 gets into the States the white illiterate is to receive his $1.60 and the black illiterate is to receive his $1.60; that is the statement here made, showing the utter confusion of mind under which the gentleman was laboring, and who by his miscalculations has made some confusion apparently in the Senate.

There is much more of this article, but I have attended to the substance of it and shown the fallacy of the ground on which the gentleman proceeds; and I have said myself as much as I desire to say in reference to the pending amendment. As I stated before, it concentrates the activities of existing schools for the prevention of the spread of the money where there are no organized schools and where it is still more needed than in the schools that already exist. It is introducing into this bill a discrimination as to color, seems designed to do that. Its purpose is to carry more money to the colored child than the white child of school age; and it is an anomaly as a Republican proposition. It has been always understood that the mission of the Republican party was to carry universal freedom, to make practically the Declaration of Independence a reality to every son and daughter of the country, regardless of race or color. It is pretty late to introduce this now, pretty late for me to learn this lesson. I trust I shall not be obliged to do so in order to support this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I offered this amendment in good faith, hoping thereby to improve the bill under consideration. The bill, it is true, was debated here a few years ago at considerable length and passed I believe at that time substantially as now proposed by the Committee on Education and Labor. I then voted for the bill with some distrust in my own mind as to the propriety of that vote as the measure then stood. I have heard the Senator from New Hampshire two or three times say that the vote cast on this side of the Chamber two years ago was in pursuance of some arrangement in a Republican caucus, and that the Republican party thereby was committed not only to the general features of an educational bill providing for national aid, but that the provisions of this bill had passed the ordeal of the caucus as well as of the Senate. I need not tell that Senator or any gentleman on this floor that Republican caucuses do not attempt to bind Senators with reference to public measures, and that every Senator upon this floor is at liberty to vote as he chooses upon any public measure notwithstanding the views of the majority of the members of the party to which he belongs.

The justification of this bill as presented in this Chamber by those who have advocated it thus far is that because of the fact that by national legislation we gave the franchise some years ago to a large class of ignorant voters we are required now to extend national aid in order that the votes of this class may in the future be cast intelligently, and also upon the further ground that it is of national interest to every State in this Union that the ballots to be cast should be cast intelligently.

Those are the only two grounds upon which I have heard the bill justified upon either side of the Chamber. In other words, if we had not emancipated the colored race, and if they were not a part of the body-politic in the several States and in the United States, would there now be a party in this Chamber that would suggest a bill such as is here proposed? Or if the colored race was as intelligent in the Southern States as the white race in those States is, would such a proposition be presented here to-day?

The basis of this bill is that there has been thrown into the civil polity of those States a class of people who have not had an opportunity to become educated and yet have had thrust upon them the ballot. Now, for myself, I would prefer, and I think I said so two years ago, that any donation or aid that is to be given by the General Government for this purpose should be given to the colored race exclusively; but I saw then as I see now that that is perhaps not a practicable measure; and therefore I am willing to give a portion of the money that is gathered together into the Treasury of the United States for the purposes of education, based upon the ideas that are presented to us by the promoters of this bill and all other bills which have been presented to the Senate of a similar character, namely, that we are to educate the illiterate portion of those people, whether they be white or colored.

The Senator from New Hampshire speaks as though the proposition contained in my amendment was a new feature in this proposed legislation. Why, Mr. President, with the exception of this bill now laid upon our tables as passed by the Senate two years ago, I do not know of a single person or association that has suggested to Congress this legislation who has not proposed that it should be upon the very basis stated in my amendment. The Senator from New Hampshire took a large amount of testimony, and with the exception of a few gentlemen who appeared, from the Southern States before his committee every educator in this country, without exception so far as I have been able to examine, suggested that this distribution should be made upon the basis of illiteracy.

Mr. BLAIR. On the basis of illiteracy?

Mr. ALLISON. On the basis of illiteracy in the State, and not on the basis of illiteracy to the States.

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly that is the bill itself. The money goes to the State in proportion to the illiteracy in the State. That determines the rule of division between the States.

Mr. ALLISON. If that is the provision of the bill as it stands to-day, then there can be no objection to the amendment which I have proposed, because that is to make it certain and clear and specific that the provisions of the bill shall apply to the illiterate people in those States, and not to the people who are not illiterate.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to suggest an objection, which is that the amendment makes a distinction on the ground of color between white and colored people. The moment that the United States Government shall draw that distinction, it will destroy the public schools.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, so far from making a distinction between the white and colored race, this amendment absolutely abstains from such distinction; it places this bill just where its promoters say it should be placed, namely, on the ground of illiteracy. Can it be proposed, and will Senators on the other side of the Chamber ask, that the white race in the Southern States, who for two hundred years successively have oppressed the colored race, shall now, in the distribution of national aid, take from one-third to one-half of the very money which the colored race ought to have because of their illiteracy in that section? Is it possible that in this rush in the South for supremacy or for education, the white people there, with this advantage of two hundred years, with the advantage of race, if you please, and of power, will not consent that the poverty-stricken race which has been thrown upon them, as they say, as voters, taking a part in the Republic with them, shall have that portion of the money which their illiteracy fairly entitles them to? I want to ask any Senator upon the other side of the Chamber if he is desirous and willing that the white race itself shall receive, on account of the illiteracy of another race, that portion of the fund which by the very terms of the bill is to be given on the basis of illiteracy? Is it possible for a Southern State to say to us, "You shall not appropriate money and give it to our schools even unless you do it upon the exact basis of school population, without reference to the fact that the white population in the South is educated as 80 per cent. is to 20 when compared with the colored population?" Will the Senator from Virginia say to me that it is an unfair distribution to give to the illiterate classes of the State of Virginia in proportion to their illiteracy, and that it will be fairer to give to the white race of that State one-half or more of this money, when in fact that white race shows that as compared with the colored race it is educated in the proportion of 80 to 20 per cent?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Yes, sir; I do say it is unfair. It is unfair from two standpoints, and the Senator's amendment would so cripple the public schools as that the poor children, whether white or black, if it shall be incorporated in the bill, will never receive the benefit of public education, for you are drawing the line between the two races.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I must of course submit to the judgment of a Senator who represents a portion of this population; but he should see as other Senators see that in the State of Virginia, and in every other Southern State, there is already a distinction drawn between the two races with respect to their schools. They have separate schools in every State, white and colored, do they not? Are there mixed schools in any of the Southern States? If there are, I have not noticed such a state. Therefore the distinction is already drawn. I am told that even constitutional provisions in these States require that the distribution of moneys shall be between white and colored schools, recognizing everywhere the distinction.

Mr. BLAIR. The bill provides that separate schools may exist; not that they must exist.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, Mr. President, will the Senator from New Hampshire appropriate the money of the Treasury of the United States for the purpose of educating people who do not require to be educated, under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly not. The bill does not——

Mr. ALLISON. Does he not desire that this bill shall apply to those people who are to-day within its provisions, namely illiterates?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. And if so, should it not be applied in proportion to that illiteracy?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. Now, that is my amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator's amendment, however, wants to apply it according to color, and not illiteracy.

Mr. ALLISON. I will read it again. I distinctly disclaim any suggestion of color; I will read it:

> And in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money paid in such State shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools in the proportion that the illiteracy of the white and colored persons aforesaid bear to each other, as shown by said census.

I ask the Senator from New Hampshire if the school moneys in the Southern States are not now distributed to white and colored schools?

Mr. BLAIR. Not wholly.

Mr. ALLISON. Are they not now applied to white and colored schools under their laws?

Mr. BLAIR. To some extent.

Mr. ALLISON. Is not that the provision of every Southern State?

Mr. BLAIR. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to answer.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand that white and colored schools are the rule in the Southern States, that there is no law, constitutional or otherwise, as far as I have known or heard, compelling the schools to be unmixed, wholly of one or wholly of the other race, but some of the schools are mixed; and the region where there are no schools, taking the South as a whole, comprises as many or more children as that where schools are already organized.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I will ask the Senator at that point whether or not the present provision for common schools in the Southern States together with the provisions of this bill will be sufficient to enable those States to establish schools in every part of those States for the benefit of all the children?

Mr. BLAIR. Nobody can tell until the effort is made whether it will be sufficient to organize all the States entirely.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator's own opinion.

Mr. BLAIR. It will go further than the existing condition of things. The bill provides that they shall apply all the moneys in that direction as far as they can.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to state whether or not, in his opinion or in the opinion of the Committee on Education and Labor, the amount of money now raised by taxation in these States, supplemented by the amount proposed to be granted by this bill, will provide common-school education for all the white and colored children of school ages in those States?

Mr. BLAIR. I do not suppose it will, and make those schools of any efficient length, but it will add very largely. It will go a great way toward it.

Mr. ALLISON. But does not the Senator believe and has he not stated over and over again in his reports that to make an efficient school system of six months in the year in those States would require an appropriation from the Federal Treasury of from twenty-five to thirty million dollars per annum, and that $15,000,000 is the lowest possible sum that could be profitably expended, covering both colored and white children?

Mr. BLAIR. I have stated always that I thought the amount proposed by this bill was not sufficient. I tried to have $105,000,000 appropriated, running over ten years. The Senate reduced the time two years and made the sum $77,000,000. I do not understand the Senator's point precisely.

Mr. ALLISON. I will enable the Senator to understand it in a moment.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish the Senator would.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall try to make myself clear. On the statement of this Committee on Education and Labor, on the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire, when this bill shall have passed, and when the power of the State for taxation shall have been exhausted, there will still be a large number of the school children in those States that will not have the benefit of education.

Mr. BLAIR. Not so much as they ought to have.

Mr. ALLISON. They will not have the benefit of this common-school education. Therefore, in the nature of things, there will be a scramble for the money that is to be appropriated here and for the money to be expended which is raised under the tax laws of those States. Now I say that in that scramble we should see to it by our legislation that those people who are illiterate and whom we propose to aid shall have their share of this money; and for that reason I have suggested the pending amendment.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him where he proposes to insert this amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. At the end of section 2.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. It is not stated on the print itself.

Mr. ALLISON. I know it is not.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. At the end of section 2?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir. I have here the handy volume presented to us by the Senator from New Hampshire, and though he is somewhat criticised for it I want to thank him for it, as furnishing us a vast amount of information. In one of the tables presented in the speech of the Senator, found on page 1211 of the RECORD, there is given the illiteracy of the white and colored races in the Southern States and in all the States of the Union.

Taken altogether, the white illiteracy in the United States of those above ten years of age is only 9 per cent. The illiteracy of the colored race is 70 per cent. as shown by that table, as against an average of 9 per cent. for the whites. If you will take that table and run over the Southern States you will find that with the single exceptions of North Carolina and Tennessee the white illiteracy in the Southern States is less than 20 per cent. of the population, and that the colored illiteracy in every one of those States exceeds 70 per cent., and in some of them it is 85.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FRYE in the chair). Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. What does the Senator mean by white illiteracy and colored illiteracy as bearing upon the necessity of the education of children, whether white or black?

Mr. ALLISON. I think I understand the purport of the Senator's question. I mean what is stated in the table, the total illiterate population ten years old and over, the white illiterate population and the colored illiterate population. I mean what the table says, and it shows that of those persons ten years of age and upwards in the whole United States the average of white illiteracy is 9 per cent. and of colored illiteracy 70 per cent.; and then I add, as appears from the table, that with two exceptions the white illiteracy in the Southern States themselves does not exceed 20 per cent.

The Senator from New Hampshire will say that that includes the white and colored population from ten years of age to a hundred. I have heard that statement made before; but fortunately for us he has himself furnished us a table which gives us an opportunity of making an accurate comparison between the white and colored races as to illiteracy of those from ten to twenty-one years of age. Table 7, also found on page 1211, shows the white and colored adult males and the adult male illiterates of the two races, with percentages, for each State and Territory. Curiously enough, the illiteracy of that table is substantially the illiteracy of the other, showing that the proportion of illiteracy runs from ten years and upward to the age of twenty-one, and clear beyond it to the age of one hundred, if you please, and that the percentage of illiteracy of people of school age is substantially the same as it is of those who are above twenty-one years of age, as shown by this table.

Mr. BLAIR. Well, assume it to be so.

Mr. ALLISON. I assume that where there are separate schools for white and colored children, if we are to appropriate money for the aid of such schools it is fair justice to both the classes that that aid shall be given in proportion to the illiteracy found in the separate schools of colored and white children.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. I will.

Mr. HOAR. If convenient to him at this time?

Mr. ALLISON. Just now.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask two questions, one being a prelude to the other. I ask whether the Senator does not understand that by the bill, section 3, lines 17 to 22, section 10, section 11, lines 17 to 25, and the last section, section 15, it is enacted that no State shall get any of this money which does not distribute all the moneys that it raises for common-school purposes equally for the education of all the children without distinction of race, which does not provide for all its children without distinction of race or color an equal opportunity for education? So the condition of the bill is the supplying by the State of a sufficient common-school education for all its children of both races.

Now, I put the second question at the same time. That being answered in the affirmative, would it not follow from the Senator's amendment either that colored children of school age are to have a larger sum expended on the education of each child than the white children, or that the State must itself remedy this inequality voted by Congress and make an inequality in its own distribution by giving more to white children so as to have the result come out equal?

Mr. ALLISON. I will answer the Senator's last question first by asking him another. If there are two hundred children in school on either side of this Capitol, on one side of it only twenty of the hundred able to read and write and on the other side eighty out of the hundred able to read and write, does he believe that it will cost no more in labor to educate the eighty children who are unable to read and write than it will cost to educate the twenty children on the other side who are unable to read and write?

Mr. HOAR. I not only believe that, but I believe it will not cost as much. Will the Senator allow me to explain?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, I should like to hear the explanation.

Mr. HOAR. If you have got eighty children out of the hundred well educated, able to read and write at least, but still going on with their common-school education on one side, and eighty children out of the hundred on the other side who can not read or write and have left home at that point, the eighty per capita—not per numeros but per capita—in any reasonable and just system, if they were the children of the same father and mother loving and prizing all alike, as they are to the State, will not require, until they are further advanced, as costly an education per capita as those who are a little further advanced. In other words, as you advance the degree of education you must have teachers of a higher grade, of higher pay, and all those things.

The defect of the Senator's amendment, as it seems to me, is that he does not consider that when you have got a perfect common-school education for everybody, then all you want to do is to secure it so that everybody has an equal chance; and because the ignorance of the black children is the occasion for national interposition you can not give $20 a head to educate them while the white children, who would not, if there were not any blacks, need any help at all, get but $5 apiece to educate them. Let each of them have $10 apiece, and educate them all.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator in answering the question very carefully excludes per numeros and includes per capita. The situation that I describe is exactly the situation between these two races. Here is the colored race having 2,200,000 children of school age. Of those 2,200,000 in the Southern States 70 per cent. are illiterate. There are, say, an equal number of white children in those States between the ages of ten and twenty-one; only 20 per cent. of them are illiterate; and yet the Senator from Massachusetts tells me that this money should be distributed exactly equally upon the basis of numbers and not upon the basis proposed in the main features of the bill.

Does not the Senator from Massachusetts know that the 20 per cent. in the Southern States have the advantage by association in the white schools over the 80 per cent., so that day by day and moment by moment, by contact they take in the education which their fellows have already acquired in the school? Does he not know (no one knows better than he does) that those white school children as they trundle home from school go to intelligent and Christian mothers and fathers, and sisters, and brothers, surrounded as they are by the intelligence of home influence and home life; whereas the 80 per cent. of the colored race go home to fathers and mothers in hovels where neither father nor mother can write or read even the Gospel which gives them salvation? Yet when we come to contribute the public bounty on the ground, and the ground alone, that we have placed an illiterate race in a position to take part in the affairs of government, and we are therefore bound in honor to contribute of our substance to enable them intelligently to take that part, the Senator says that we can not do it unless we give dollar for dollar upon an exact and measurable equality, as much to the white race already educated and who have the start of the colored race in civilization by thousands of years, and that we are doing an injustice when we propose to give the money upon the basis of the necessities of those people!

Mr. EDMUNDS. And where the State law makes the distinction.

Mr. ALLISON. And where the State law by positive enactment makes the distinction, and places the races in separation in the schools. If it was not in the Senate of the United States, I should think any other proposition than the one which I make was monstrous; but it seems that even my proposition is regarded as ridiculous by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from New Hampshire.

Upon the question of white and colored schools I wish to read one or two statements which I find in this handy volume respecting the methods of appropriating this money, because, as I understand, in every Southern State—and if there is a Southern State in which this is not done I will ask a Senator from that State to give me the information—to-day by law and by constitutional provision the moneys raised for schools must be distributed between the white and colored population substantially alike. Is there an exception to that rule? Is there a State in the South that discriminates in its laws against the colored race? If there is, I am not aware of it.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him whether the effect of his amendment would not be—I do not refer to the whole effect of it but one partial effect—to allow a State that has a large proportion of white illiterates to discriminate against them? I so read the amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is no distinction between white and black. Each one takes its share.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understood it in the way I have stated. If I am mistaken I should like to be informed.

Mr. ALLISON. It is an absolute mistake. On the contrary, it is to make the equality absolute, so that the application shall be to the illiterates, whether they be white or black or of any other race.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Does the amendment apply to States where the white and colored schools are distinct?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir; and only there.

I find in the testimony a statement made by a gentleman from South Carolina with reference to the schools in the city of Charleston.

Mr. BLAIR. On what page, please?

Mr. ALLISON. I read from page 1254 of the RECORD containing the speech of the Senator from New Hampshire. Mr. Thompson appeared before the committee and gave information respecting South Carolina. He said:

> I now desire to call the attention of the committee to the second point I make, which is that the State of South Carolina is unable because of her impoverished condition to give proper instruction to all classes of her people. The scholastic population of the State—

In 1875—he thinks it is substantially the same as the census of 1880—> was, whites 85,678, colored 152,293, making a total of 237,971 children—

Between the ages of 10 and 16 years.

> The school attendance in South Carolina for the year 1880-'81 was, whites 61,339—

Or within 24,000 of the whole number—

> Colored, 12,119—

Or less than one-twelfth of the whole number. Out of 152,293 colored children between the ages of ten and sixteen, with absolute equality in your laws, with absolute equality in the distribution of your funds, there were but 12,119 who appeared at the schools in the State, according to this intelligent gentleman, Mr. Hugh Thompson, of South Carolina.

Mr. HAMPTON. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMPTON. I think that the Senator has made a mistake in quoting from that statement, for the report of Mr. Thompson, who was subsequently governor, will show a larger attendance of colored children in South Carolina than of white, if my recollection is right. I have before me the report of the present superintendent of education, which shows that there are 178,000 children attending school in South Carolina, and in those schools, supported nearly in toto by the white people, the report shows that there are 99,000 colored children at school, and but 79,000 white children.

Mr. ALLISON. I am glad to know that the present report shows an improvement in that direction. I only take this statement from the testimony furnished to me by the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor, because I read from his speech.

Mr. BLAIR. The statement was made as to the condition in 1875, the Senator will observe.

Mr. ALLISON. Senators will observe that the language is "the school attendance in South Carolina for the year 1880-'81." Who was in power then, may I ask the Senator from South Carolina? Was the Republican party then in power there?

Mr. HAMPTON. No; the Democratic party. The Republicans had control in 1875.

Mr. ALLISON. The Democratic party was in power, and in 1881, so says Mr. Thompson, the whites attending school were sixty-one thousand, and the colored twelve thousand. As the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] very properly suggests, if they have made such a rapid progress between 1880-'81 and 1885-'86 it would seem that even they might get on without the appropriation suggested in the bill. But I do not wish to take that view of it.

I wish now, Mr. President, to call your attention to another statement made by Mr. Thompson:

> Taking the illiteracy of South Carolina shown by the return of the last census, which I had an opportunity of observing last night, the ratio of white illiterates to the whole population is 7.77 per cent.

Mr. Thompson was mistaken in that; the ratio is 15 per cent., as shown in another part of the speech, as taken from the census of white illiteracy.

> The ratio of colored illiteracy to the whole population is 33.09.

That was too low a statement also for South Carolina. Then he says—

> I maintain that as far as controlling the white illiteracy in the State is concerned, South Carolina is able, ready, and willing to control it; and that she is equally ready and willing to control the colored illiteracy, but that it is beyond her power to do so. It is from this class of our citizens, a class to whom I claim that the State government of South Carolina in all its departments has done full and ample justice, that the trouble comes.

It never entered the mind of Mr. Hugh Thompson when he was before the committee that the State of South Carolina would grasp at one-half of this fund for her white children, although her white children were illiterate only to the extent of 15 per cent.

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion to him?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say that by virtue of the bill South Carolina is obliged to so apply all the funds that she otherwise would give to her white children as that there will be produced an equalization of privilege to all.

Mr. ALLISON. The State of South Carolina, by her laws, by her constitution, by every reason that can apply to human nature or to human justice, is required to do that thing, whether the Government of the United States gives 1 cent or $1,000,000. Those people are a part of her population; she has for hundreds of years secured the benefits of their labor, and made herself largely rich and opulent before the war because of the labor of those people or their fathers. Can South Carolina or any Southern State say that it does not behoove her to use whatever portion of money she can raise by taxation properly for the education of the children of that State?

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator's question should be answered in the affirmative. The other question immediately occurs, has she done it? The statistics which the Senator has read show that she has not done it. When she accepts this money she contracts to do it hereafter.

Mr. ALLISON. South Carolina and all the Southern States now are required to do this thing. Does the Senator believe if they do not do it now that they will do it under the provisions of his bill?

Mr. President, this is an exceptional bill. Here we propose to turn over to the States, a thing unexampled and unprecedented, $77,000,000, to be expended under State authority and State control, without one particle of supervision on the part of the General Government. Can any Senator give me an instance in the history of the United States from its foundation where that thing has ever been done before?

Mr. BLAIR. There has never been a contribution from the National Government which was not precisely in that same way, without supervision and without conditions.

Mr. ALLISON. There has never been any contribution like this.

Mr. BLAIR. There were the contributions to go to the common schools in the case of the proceeds of the sales of public lands; and the $28,000,000 which I showed day before yesterday went principally to the benefit of schools was given absolutely without any conditions at all, and was distributed in a single year.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from New Hampshire has failed to read the history of that transaction. Does he not know that that $28,000,000 was never given to the States at all; that it was a loan to the States, and by the very terms of that loan made a sacred trust, and each State receiving its share was bound to pledge its good faith to return every dollar of that money, and that every dollar to-day stands against the States on the books of the Treasury Department, and they stand indebted for it? No conditions! Why, that was a loan of surplus revenue, a loan to be collected presently, not by a statute of the United States, but Secretary Manning, if he chooses to do so, can issue an order to-day requiring the State of Ohio and the State of Massachusetts to pay that money in sixty days. The law was so rigid in its character and so perfect in detail that all the Secretary of the Treasury has to do is to demand of the States the money, and they are bound in good faith to return it. Assimilate that to a donation of $77,000,000 that goes into the treasury of the States as a gift, without control, without limitation except as the States through their officers give an account of their action in communications to the Secretary of the Interior!

Mr. BLAIR. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. That is quite an impassioned statement of the matter, which is proper enough, but the Senator must know that there is no substance to it.

Mr. ALLISON. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. BLAIR. If the Senator will allow me——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield?

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield once more.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator was not yielding more than is usual in debate. If he thinks he is indulging in any excessive courtesy I shall not interrupt him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has a right to the floor and ought not to be interrupted except with his consent.

Mr. BLAIR. I insist that he ought to be interrupted, by the usages and practice of the Senate, unless he insists that he shall not be interrupted; and I do not understand that I am at all indulging any unusual assertion of myself on this occasion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire. He has spoken so little on this subject that I feel that I ought to yield whenever he asks me to do so.

Mr. BLAIR. As I said before, if the Senator thinks that he indulges in any unusual courtesy, I shall not trespass upon him.

Mr. ALLISON. No, certainly not.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish to say with reference to his statement in regard to the $28,000,000 distributed, deposited as a matter of form, always understood as a matter of form and not of substance, every dollar of it was distributed throughout the States according to their own inclinations, appropriated by them fifty years ago generally to the aid of the schools, already expended in that way, and no human being has the slightest idea that the assertion of the reserved right, which was a mere formal matter, will ever be made at all.

Mr. ALLISON. That was a side question, and I would not have alluded to it but for the fact that the Senator from New Hampshire has several times in the debate mentioned it as a precedent for this bill. I state again, and I challenge contradiction, that there is not within the range of public legislation in this country, save and except perhaps the illustration made the other day by the Senator from Mississippi, a case in which public money has been appropriated without the direction and control of the General Government. That was the case of Venezuela, where we made a contribution many years ago to relieve distress in that country. But in every other instance the United States has undertaken to follow the money that it has appropriated. Now, why does it not do so here? It does not do so in deference to gentlemen upon the other side of this Chamber who have constitutional scruples with reference to the power of the General Government to go into the States upon this question. I respect those constitutional scruples. I am willing myself to trust the States largely in this regard; but while I am so willing I desire for one, if I am to vote for this bill, that the money shall go where the Senator from Mississippi and other Senators upon that side of the Chamber have said it was necessary it should go—that is, to those people who are illiterate in their several States, without reference to color or race, and not because of color or race.

Mr. President, I do not wish to occupy the attention of the Senate with regard to the amendment which I have offered. Every Senator understands it as well as I do. The tables show conclusively that if we do not adopt this amendment, instead of doing what the trustees of the Peabody fund, what the association of teachers, what the large number of petitioners who have petitioned for such a bill as this seem to think we are doing, we are providing for the education of the white race in the Southern States, who I think, as this gentleman from South Carolina thinks, are abundantly able to educate themselves.

This amendment is not to be whistled down the wind, I give notice, by mere statements that there are general provisions in the bill already which cover the case. If the bill now does what is proposed in my amendment, then the amendment can do no harm; but if the bill does not do that, the amendment clinches the irregularity and the injustice proposed in the tenth section of this bill by providing, not that this distribution shall be made on the basis of illiteracy, but providing absolutely that it shall not be so made, but that it shall be made upon the number of school children in the State, and no other basis can be adopted under it. So, Mr. President, I have offered this amendment in good faith believing that it is essential.

Mr. HOAR. Where does the Senator find what he says in the tenth section?

Mr. ALLISON. It is found in the fourth and fifth lines of that section:

> As near as may be for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory.

Mr. HOAR. That is very different from what the Senator from Iowa said.

Mr. ALLISON. That is to be taken in connection with the other sections of the bill, which require that this fund shall be distributed on the basis of school population. So then the provisions of this bill are intended to clinch and make more certain a distribution which I think is unjust and unfair.

Now I wish to say one thing further with reference to this bill before I close, and that is that I am willing to vote this money for the purposes which I have indicated; and when I do that I do not desire to be understood as voting for it because the State of Iowa receives a small pittance of this money. Of this $77,000,000 to be thus distributed in eight years the State of Iowa will receive only $575,000, less than 10 cents per annum upon the school children of my State; yet we expend in the State of Iowa annually for schools by taxation five and a half million dollars. What kind of taxation, a Senator asks. Not State taxation, not Federal taxation, but county and local taxation under our laws. Under our school system the people who are benefited by the schools vote for the taxes, distribute the money, and account to the tax-payers for the money thus expended; and under this local system, which I suppose is substantially the local system of every State, we last year collected and for several years have collected an amount exceeding $5,000,000 for school purposes.

Mr. BUTLER. What about the public lands granted to your State?

Mr. ALLISON. I thank the Senator for suggesting that question. The State of Iowa, as every other State except the original thirteen that got all the lands within their borders, and the State of Texas which came into the Union with all her lands, received a portion of the public lands within her limits for the benefit of her school system, under an arrangement which was common to all the States admitted by which the lands of the Federal Government should not be taxed. Under that provision the State of Iowa has a school fund of near $4,000,000, a school fund built up, if I may use that term, by the same means and from the same source that was given to the State of Mississippi, to the State of Alabama, and to every other State of this Union, so far as I know, except the original thirteen and those that were admitted within a few years after the adoption of the Constitution.

Mr. GEORGE. I ask the Senator how many sections were donated for schools in each township in Iowa?

Mr. ALLISON. I believe the grant in Iowa was every sixteenth section in a township.

Mr. GEORGE. And the thirty-sixth section, too?

Mr. ALLISON. No; we only had one section in a township—the sixteenth. I will answer the Senator from Mississippi, however, by saying to him that in this handy volume, from which I have so often quoted, I find that the State of Mississippi received a little more land on account of schools than did the State of Iowa. So whatever our brethren of South Carolina and New York and other older States may say, it does not become the Senator from Mississippi to say that Iowa has received a bounty that was not also given to the State of Mississippi. That sum I say is $4,000,000, accumulated from these resources, the income of which amounts to the enormous sum of $240,000 per year, and that is the only income the State of Iowa has from a permanent school fund—$240,000 a year as against five and a half million dollars expended.

Mr. BUTLER. Raised by taxation?

Mr. ALLISON. By taxation and taxation alone. We have 1,800,000 people there possibly—1,700,000 by the last census—and we have taxed ourselves in this way for the purpose of educating the children of our State. I submit to the Senator from South Carolina that although we have a rich and fertile soil and an industrious population, yet when you get off into the inner regions of the State in which I live, where our people reside upon the prairies at a great distance from fuel, they have to struggle day by day to secure a livelihood sufficient to enable them to live as the people of Iowa desire to live and to educate their children as the people of Iowa desire to educate them.

As I have said, I would prefer that this bill were put upon a different basis with reference to the distribution of the money. I should be content to be more liberal than this bill provides in reference to where the money should go. I would surrender for the State of Iowa this pitiful 10 cents per annum to each one of its children of school age, and I would give it to the illiterate children of South Carolina and Mississippi, who need it more than we do, and upon the very basis which the Senator from Massachusetts stated the other day as the justification for this bill, namely, the basis that it was necessary to have an intelligent people to exercise intelligently the powers of a free government.

In the State of Iowa, as shown by the census, only 2.2 per cent. of her people are illiterate. Is it possible that upon any basis of justification any portion of this money should go to Iowa? I do not believe it. I do not believe that in any of the Northern States there is such illiteracy as would endanger the institutions under which we live. I believe that in all these States we have not only the ability but the disposition, from local taxation gathered in each community from the great body of the people, to educate them as they should be educated. Now, our Southern friends say to us that they have not the ability to educate their white people and their colored people as well. If they have not I am willing for one to go to the national Treasury and give them such portion of the money there as is needed to properly aid them in this work; but I want them to apply that money where the trouble is, to the illiterate people of the South and not to the intelligent people of the South.

Mr. President, I have occupied much longer time than I intended in these remarks.

Mr. HAMPTON. I rose while the Senator from Iowa was speaking to correct what I thought was a mistake into which he had fallen. I did not have the document before me then, but I have it now. In the report of the Secretary of the Interior for this year, and in the report of the Commissioner of Education submitted with the report of the Secretary of the Interior, I find that the whites enrolled in public schools in 1882–'83 in South Carolina were 74,157; the colored children enrolled in public schools were 98,398. In 1883–'84 the enrollment respectively was, of whites 84,028 and of colored 101,591; and the report of the superintendent for 1884–'85 shows the enrollment of whites to be 78,458 and of colored 99,565. I have no doubt that the figures from which the Senator quoted were a misprint. That is all I have to say.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not yield to any man on this floor or elsewhere in my support of public schools. I have as high an opinion of the great work of the public schools as any person can possibly have. I am anxious to extend to all parts of the country financial aid if it be necessary, and I am also anxious to go beyond that, to create in the minds of the people a desire to keep up public schools and an attachment for the public-school system.

I ventured the other day when this bill was before the Senate to criticise its terms. I regret to say that this appeared to meet disapprobation on the part of some of the friends of the bill, and there was at least the intimation, if nothing further, that the opposition to the bill was not in good faith but was made for the purpose of defeating the appropriation. So far as I am personally concerned I have no constitutional objections to the bill. I have no constitutional difficulties in dealing with this subject. Long ago, on this floor and elsewhere, I have committed myself unequivocally, unhesitatingly, unrestrictedly, to the power of the General Government to contribute out of its great abundance to the support of public schools anywhere within its jurisdiction. I have no difficulty in following such appropriations by Federal control. I have no doubt of the proposition that when the General Government has contributed the money the General Government may also direct where it shall go and how it shall be expended.

I do not see myself how any man on either side of the Chamber can maintain that the right exists in the General Government to appropriate the money, and yet that the General Government has not the power to direct its expenditure. It does not follow because the power exists in the General Government to follow an appropriation, that it necessarily should do so. In all of my utterances upon this question, I have assumed that the purpose of the appropriation was first to meet a present emergency, to meet an emergency that ought to have been met many years ago, secondly to stimulate the States to build up within their borders a school system to which the people should become so thoroughly and certainly attached that under all circumstances it would be maintained. Because my views have been in that direction I have been willing to a great extent to trust the States. I have been willing to vote for appropriations that should give to the States the money, and then trust to their honesty and their zeal in the cause of public education for a proper application of the money so appropriated. But I should not be willing to vote a dollar of public money to any State if it was not with the understanding that if the State did not properly apply the money, the General Government might withdraw the appropriation, or in case of great emergency might interfere and establish schools within the borders of the State.

I do not think the beneficiaries of this bill—and when I speak now of the beneficiaries I mean the people who are to receive the great share of this money—ought to complain of a moderate restriction or of a moderate direction as to the appropriation of the money. I would not myself be in favor of establishing side by side with the State schools, as long as the States were making an effort to maintain public schools at all, national schools. I would not be in favor of interfering with the State schools. Neither do I understand that any amendment which has so far been offered to this bill, including even the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, in any wise interferes with the State schools or can in any wise impair their usefulness or their efficiency.

It has been said all through this discussion which has now lasted in this body for nearly five years, and it has been said over and over again, that the States who are to receive the greatest proportion of this money were too poor to furnish to the children of those States proper and suitable educational facilities. Mr. President, I have never myself agreed to that proposition. I do not believe to-day that there is a State or a Territory within the jurisdiction of the United States that is not abundantly able to maintain a reasonable common-school system for the education of all the children of the State or Territory; but I realize the fact that in some of the States the people have been unwilling, have been reluctant to pay the necessary expenses for the maintenance of public schools.

I have taken some pains to look over the census returns and ascertain the comparative wealth of the States which or whose people are thus complaining. I do not say the complaint comes altogether from the regions of country where school facilities have not been furnished, for the complaint comes with equal volume from people of our own section of the country who insist that the South is unable to maintain public schools. According to the census of 1880, the State of Alabama was estimated to have $338,000,000 of assessable property, and I find that in that year the State of Alabama paid $448,498 for public instruction, for school facilities to the great number of children within its borders. I find that Arkansas was estimated to have $246,000,000 of assessable property and paid $479,471 for school purposes. Delaware had $138,000,000 of assessable property and paid $207,000 for public schools. Florida had $95,000,000 of assessable property and paid $133,000 for schools. Georgia, with $554,000,000 of assessable property, paid $613,260 for public schools. Mississippi, with $324,000,000 of assessable property, paid $803,000 for public schools. North Carolina, with $446,000,000 of assessable property, paid $582,000 for school purposes. South Carolina, with $296,000,000 of assessable property, paid $341,176 for school purposes. West Virginia, with $307,000,000 of assessable property, paid $553,000 for school purposes. Tennessee, with $666,000,000 of assessable property, paid $795,000. Colorado, the youngest of the States, had $149,000,000 of assessable property and paid $752,000 for the support of public schools. Nebraska, with $290,000,000 of assessable property, paid $1,358,346. Texas, with $725,000,000 of assessable property, paid $1,150,332, less than $200,000 as much as Nebraska.

Mr. President, these figures, in my judgment, show that the people of the South and the people of the North are everywhere financially able to take care of the public-school system, a fact that I knew as well five years ago when I voted for aid to the public schools of the land as I know it to-day. I have never based any vote I have given nor any utterance I have made in defense of appropriations of Federal aid to the schools of the land upon the theory that the States were unable to support public schools, but upon the theory that they had declined or neglected to do so, and with the hope that by our so giving Federal aid they might be incited to see the beauty and the advantage of the common-school system, and that they might thus do in the South what has been done in the North and what has been done in the great West. I said five years ago on this floor, educate the community and they will maintain schools no matter now poor they may be. I have seen it illustrated and exemplified in my acquaintance with the Western country. Let me speak of my own State, and I speak of it with the utmost pride, and I think I may speak of it as an illustration of what I have said before, that the people who have been educated in the public schools, who have seen the advantages of the system, love it as they love no other institution in the land, and they place it a little even above the church of their fathers.

In 1859 the great wave of emigration departed from the settled States across the arid regions of the West and lodged at the foot of the Rocky Mountains; thousands of men went out there, staid a few days, and returned; but many remained, and more came. In 1861 the Government of the United States gave to those people a Territorial organization with exactly the boundaries that the State of Colorado has to-day. In September, 1861, in the midst of war, in the midst of tumult, in the midst of excitement, the people of that Territory organized their first government. The Legislature met the last of September, and on the 7th day of November following the people of that Territory through their Legislature adopted a complete and perfect free-school system. They not only adopted a free-school system to give every child within the borders of Colorado a common-school education, but they established a university, and they attached to the common schools a high-school system that has been efficient and valuable to the people of Colorado so that to-day in all the towns and cities of any considerable importance in the State the high schools send out boys fully qualified to enter Yale, Harvard, or Princeton or any other of the great institutions of the land.

Mr. President, when the people of Colorado adopted that system there had never been a surveyor in the Territory, there was not an acre of land except a few grants on the southern border that was not owned by the General Government. The first school-houses we built were built upon the public lands before we could get control of the title from the General Government. We have followed it from that day to this. We have to-day the most efficient school system of any State in the Union, I think, and last year we paid beyond Federal aid, for the purpose of maintaining our public schools, $21.43 for every child in the State between the age of six and sixteen years, and taking that as the basis we have put 90 per cent. of our children in the public schools. We have maintained in addition three institutions of high character, one for the education of people in practical metallurgy and mining, another for giving them the highest education that can be given in a university; and we have maintained also an agricultural college built long before we ever received a dollar from the Government of the United States in support of our schools.

I know that when we speak of the school system in the West Senators say: "You have received magnificent donations of public land." Why, Mr. President, when I speak of the expenditure of money I speak of an expenditure over and above and beyond anything that the Government has given to us. Last year the total receipts from the Government aid that we received and passed into our school fund were less then a dollar per capita for the children enrolled in our schools. I had hoped that by an appropriation of this character we could stimulate in all sections of the country some of the spirit that has pervaded the people of Colorado and of Nebraska and other Western States, who in their very beginning, in their poverty, were ready to part with their money for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a free-school system. If this bill can be properly amended, if it can be put in proper shape, I believe that that will be the result; and I am anxious myself to vote for a measure which will accomplish that, even if no very great deal of immediate result follows from the appropriation of this money. If we could put into the hearts and minds of the people of Louisiana and of Mississippi and of Georgia the sentiment of attachment to schools and the school system that pervades in some other sections of the country they would find means to maintain schools for all the people within their borders.

I know it was said by the Senator from Mississippi on the other side that we have a virgin soil and that we have natural advantages. Mr. President, when we went to Colorado we went 600 miles beyond the line of a railroad. When the first school-house was built in Colorado there was not a mile of railroad within 600 miles. There was scarcely a break in that great arid region; but little had been done. Those people were there in a new country, with undeveloped riches, it is true, but requiring great labor to make them available. They had yet to tear down the mountains and fill up the valleys to make an entrance into the mountains where the riches were in existence. All of these things they did, but they did not while doing them neglect the school system.

Since we adopted a State government we have had a constitution which provides that the State shall not run in debt, the State shall contract no debt that exceeds $50,000; and yet we allow our school districts to run in debt whenever it is necessary for the protection of the interest of the children of the State. We have no State debt; we do not allow the municipal authorities to run in debt beyond a limited sum, and yet the school districts of Colorado have borrowed a million of money to put in school-houses in that new State. We do not ask a dollar of Federal aid, and I do not believe there is a man in Colorado who would accept a million of money from the Government of the United States if it would interfere with our cherished State system of public schools, and I am as clear from wanting to interfere in the system of public schools in the South as I am to have the Government interfere with the system in my own State. I believe, however, that it is but fair and proper and prudent that the Government of the United States when appropriating this money should have at least a discretionary control over it, so as to see that it goes to the class of people who are particularly needing the education that, under the unfortunate circumstances which have surrounded them, they have been unable to acquire.

I do not see myself why any Senator on the other side should be sensitive when it is proposed to say that if there are three times as many black children assembled in black schools as there are white children in white schools there shall be three-fourths of the money appropriated to those black schools. If they were all assembled in one school then I could see that there would be no propriety in saying that it should be divided according to the illiteracy of the races; but they are not unlike some other sections of the country, and not unnaturally—I do not wonder at it myself—they do not propose to commingle the whites and the blacks together. I believe it is better in the South that the two races should be kept in separate schools. But if there are three schools required to educate the black children in a State and only one required for the white children it does not strike me that it can be objectionable to the friends of this bill if it should be said by the giving power, "We give to you three for one class and one for the other;" $3 for the three schools and $1 for the one school, and in that proportion.

If this bill can be put in such a shape that it will carry out the two great purposes for which I have contended, I shall cheerfully vote for it. If it does not, I think we had better wait another year. We have waited for twenty years. If it is a duty that the Government owes now to appropriate this money, it is a duty that it owed twenty years ago; and, I am free to say, it is a complaint I have made more than once; it was a duty twenty years ago, but it was a duty which the Government failed to perform. I want to perform it in such a manner that it shall accomplish the two great purposes—first, that it shall educate the uneducated, and, second, that it shall be received by the people in such a spirit and in such a manner as to attach them to the system, and not create an antagonism and an opposition to the public-school system at the South.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. President, although a member of the committee which reported this bill, I have thus far refrained from taking part in the discussion, because I hoped that the debate had upon this bill in the last Congress would be considered sufficient, and that upon that debate then had this bill might have passed without a prolonged discussion, such as we have now had. While debate has been had upon the constitutional power of the Government to make this appropriation, I have taken little or no interest in it, believing that the Senators upon this side, from their political training and political beliefs, would hold steadily and unanimously to the ground that there is sufficient constitutional warrant for it; believing also that the Senators on the other side of the Chamber, or a majority of them, while they may have been taught in a school holding to a stricter and more limited interpretation of our fundamental law, would yet, recognizing the voice coming up from all the South asking for more and better schools, decide finally this question in favor of the broad construction of the Constitution and that their votes would also be given for the bill. I believe that substantially the Senators upon this side do hold to the constitutional power of the Government to make this appropriation, and I have no doubt that a majority of the Senators on the other side will at least take that view and emphasize it by their votes.

But for the last week or more an opposition has sprung up in this Chamber against this bill which I am unable to comprehend. While it does not attack the power of the Government to make the appropriation, it has fought the bill at every step; it has embarrassed it by amendments which, if carried out, would entirely destroy the principle upon which the bill is founded. Many amendments have been proposed for which I can find no other reason than a desire on the part of some of the Senators to substantially break down this bill. I regret this exceedingly. I hold this bill, or at all events the subject of which this bill treats, to be by far the most important question before the American people.

I shall not detain the Senate at this time in going into any extensive discussion of the necessities for this measure. They are admitted by all. The bill proposes to meet the great danger which threatens our institutions from a vast mass of illiteracy found chiefly in one portion of our country. It undertakes to appropriate this large sum of money in such a way that the bulk of it shall be distributed where the bulk of the evil is found. It undertakes to appropriate the money upon the basis of illiteracy.

It may be urged against that that it does not lead to a just and equitable distribution of this fund between the States; but it is believed that it meets all the equities of the case and the necessities of the case, for it is undoubtedly true that in proportion as any State is illiterate just in that proportion is it unable to meet the demands which come upon it for education, because illiteracy is but another name for poverty. If the laboring population of any section of our country are illiterate they are at the same time poor, and at the same time they are inefficient workmen. Increase the education of the laboring classes and you increase in exact proportion the power of the laboring classes to care for themselves and to care for the Government of which they are a part. Therefore if it shall be found under this distribution, to be made under the census of 1880, that there is a large amount of illiteracy in any particular State of this Union, it will also be found that the assessable property of that State has also been diminished by that illiteracy, and that for that reason it is unable to bear the extra burden which comes upon it. I believe that if it be looked at in that light the ground-plan of this bill for the distribution of this money to the States on the basis of the illiteracy of the people will be seen to be as near right as possible.

After the money has been distributed to each individual State and Territory, we then come to another important question, and that is, how the money given to the State shall be distributed within the borders of the State to the various schools and to the children therein taught. This bill, after having taken account of the whole illiteracy of a State in the distribution of the money to the State, when it comes to the distribution of the money in the State itself undertakes to deal only with the children of school age in that State. It can go no farther than this. It can not attempt to educate the citizens of any State who have passed the school age. And, therefore, it is that the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, if it be enacted, would entirely change the plan of the distribution as proposed in this bill. Is it wise to do so? I think not.

What are the provisions of this bill? In section 3 it is provided that—

> No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that shall not have provided by law a system of free common schools for all of its children of school age, without distinction of race or color, either in the raising or distributing of school revenues or in the school facilities afforded.

Before any State can avail itself of any portion of this appropriation it must have complied with those provisions. By that section we require of each individual State that it shall distribute its public moneys for school purposes in exact proportion to the number of children of school age of either race, white or black. If it fails to provide by law for doing that, then it can avail itself of none of the benefits of this act. While we do not undertake to impose laws or regulations on the State, yet we have provided in this bill that their school laws shall be equal and exact and that the money shall be distributed to the children of both races in equal proportions as they shall bear to the whole number of children of the school age.

Then in section 10 we have further provided:

That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used only for common schools, not sectarian in character, in the school districts of the several States and Territories, in such way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made, thereby giving to each child, without distinction of race or color, an equal opportunity for education.

Thus, Mr. President, this bill undertakes to say to the States that if they take this money they must first provide by their laws for an equal distribution of their own school fund which they raise by direct taxation; secondly, it undertakes to say that if a State receives this public money it shall distribute it in like manner to all the children of school age, white or black. What can be more just than that? What other plan can be devised which will so carefully guard the school system of any State than a provision of law that the public moneys shall be distributed throughout the State to the various schools and school districts in exact proportion to the number of children of school age?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I wish to suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire that that phrase "of school age" occurs several times with reference to the State laws, and at other times with reference to the ten and twenty-one years that we find in this bill. I suggest, while I think of it, to the Senator from New Hampshire to look at that and see whether he had not better fix it from ten to twenty-one, or say what he means exactly by "school age," so that there will be no doubt about it.

Mr. BLAIR. There is only one school age spoken of, that is the school age fixed by the State.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I do not propose an amendment; I only make the suggestion for the Senator's consideration.

Mr. BLAIR. I understand.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. Mr. President, I was about to say that the plan laid down in this bill for the distribution of this money is substantially the plan followed to-day in every Northern State, at least, of this Union in the distribution of its public moneys for school purposes. The State of New York raises by direct taxation for its schools a little more than $3,000,000, and by local taxation in the various school districts and cities, in round numbers, about $10,000,000 per annum. The $3,000,000 of the public money raised by public taxation upon all the property of the State is divided among the various schools of the State, chiefly upon the basis of the number of school children that are found within each several school district. Some of it is appropriated in proportion to the number of teachers employed and some other minor considerations, but the chief consideration in the distribution of the public money, I say of every State in this Union, is the number of children of the school age. Now, if we attempt to lay down any other plan in the distribution of this money, we shall bring into confusion the school systems of all the States of this Union, North and South, for I do not believe that if this bill shall pass there is a single State in the Union that will refuse to receive its quota or that will fail to bring itself under the law. Although we may not need it in the North, although we may be able to carry on our schools without Federal aid, yet the State of New York has never refused any aid coming from any source for the support of its schools, and I have no doubt that whatever proportion of public money under this bill may come to that State will be received and properly distributed. But to-day it distributes its public money under the plan which I have mentioned. If another plan shall be laid down in this bill, then certainly great changes will be necessary in the school laws of nearly all, if not all, the States of this Union.

The vast amount of illiteracy in the South, and particularly among the colored race, has led many of the humanitarians of our country to study this question long and carefully and to devise and propose many remedies for the cure of the evil. Soon after the war it was proposed that special aid should be asked from the Federal Government for the education of the colored people alone; and through the Freedmen's Bureau for awhile the Federal Government undertook to do something in that direction, but thus dealing with one race alone it was found a failure and was abandoned. Private individuals have given a portion of their wealth for this cause, and the Christian churches of the North have raised vast sums of money and have expended them for the education of the colored race in the South. Against that I have no word to say; I have approved of it all. But when the Federal Government comes to act, the Government which acts for all the people alike, certainly it seems to me that it ought to be our endeavor here to rather abolish and obliterate all distinctions of race and color and to seek to mold into one homogeneous mass all our people, North and South.

If the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] should prevail what would be the condition of affairs in the South? This amendment reads—

And in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money paid in such State shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools in the proportion that the illiteracy of the white and colored persons aforesaid bear to each other, as shown by said census.

The Senator made an efficient argument in support of this amendment. I have no doubt he is sincere in believing it to be wise and just; but before we adopt the amendment we had better pause in the consideration of this bill and abandon it all, for if the amendment shall prevail I believe it will be the beginning of a war of races which neither you nor I nor any of us will see the end of. Under the laws of the Southern States to-day their public moneys are to be distributed equally between the children of the two races in exact proportion to their numbers. If it has happened thus far that the white race has been better educated in the South than the colored race, and if that still be true, it comes not because of any fault of the law; it may come because of a failure to properly execute it; but I would suggest to my friends on this side that it may come largely from the same reasons which, prevailing in the North, always lead to this condition of affairs—that the children of poor parents in the North are, as a rule, more illiterate than the children of the rich people; that the children of the poor people in the North, although there is an abundance of free schools in their neighborhood, sometimes find it necessary to labor for the support of their parents, and thus are deprived of the advantages of the schools which are in their immediate vicinity. Undoubtedly in the Southern country the colored children, who are scattered over the whole vast territory upon plantations and farms, and who are early put to work, do not find it possible to avail themselves of the advantages of education which come to the children of the owners of the soil, which come to the children of the white people who largely live in the cities and towns and thereby have better means of education.

I hope and believe that the difference which is found in the South between the illiteracy of colored children and of white children is due to the circumstances that I have mentioned, rather than to any disposition upon the part of the governing classes of the South, for the governments of all the Southern States are now absolutely in the hands of the white people—I say I hope and believe that is due rather to these circumstances than to any indisposition upon the part of the whites of the South to afford equal educational privileges to the children of the colored race.

But if there shall be found anywhere in the South a disposition upon the part of some of its people to deprive the colored children of their fair share of the public moneys, if it has been so in the past, I believe that this measure and the interest which this measure will create in every county, in every parish, and in every school district in the South will do very much to remove that trouble, and will do very much to improve the education of the colored children.

However, if we shall say by this measure that the money shall be distributed not in proportion to the number of school children of each race, but in proportion to the illiteracy of all the children of each race, then it will undoubtedly result in giving in round numbers about $3 of this fund to every colored child of the South to $1 to every white child of the South, and it will undoubtedly bring about a condition of feeling upon the part of the people of that section which will be anything in my judgment but conducive to the welfare of the country or to the education of all the people.

We might as well, I say, entirely abandon this bill and make a direct appropriation of so much money to be distributed absolutely to colored schools and none others, for if the principle of the amendment as I have stated it be correct, or approaches correctness, then it would certainly be better and wiser to distribute none of this fund whatever among the white schools, but to give it all to the colored schools. For one I trust that that will not be done. As the provisions of the bill now stand, the plan upon which it is based is in my judgment the only correct plan upon which we can distribute the public fund for this purpose; and rather than see this amendment prevail, bringing this degree of uncertainty into the operations of all our school laws in each State, fearing also that it would bring about a race hatred and a race war in the South, I would prefer to see the measure fail entirely. I have confidence enough in the American citizen of all portions of our country to believe that the measure will be substantially executed not only in accordance with its letter but with its spirit, and that our fellow-citizens of the South will see to it, so far as they are able, that equal school privileges shall be given to all their children of school age, without distinction of race or color.

If I did not believe that I would not be willing to vote a single dollar for this purpose. Believing it, I am willing to vote enough of the public money to make such a beginning in this matter that the Southern States shall be so lifted out of their darkness and illiteracy that when this $77,000,000 shall have been distributed such a public spirit will have been created in the South that from that time on they will be able to go on with their common-school system perfected, and carry it to complete perfection, as we have done at the North.

I trust, then, that the friends of this bill will not attempt to destroy it by changing its plan; but if it can be made more certain in its operations, if anything can be added to it in the line in which I have spoken, in the distribution of the fund, I shall for one gladly welcome such amendments. Thus far I have seen none which in any way add to the bill, but all of them now pending will substantially, I believe, if adopted, do very much to destroy the efficiency of the bill and take away very much from the benefits which are expected to accrue.

Mr. HALE. There are several Senators who, I believe, desire to speak upon the pending amendment, and if any Senator at this late hour desires to take the floor I shall not make the motion which I rose to make.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I have a peculiar interest in this educational bill, and I shall not detain the Senate three minutes in expressing my opposition to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

If I had but one appeal to make to those who pretend to be friends of the colored people of the South, leaving out the white people entirely, I would simply say, never endeavor to make a race distinction in the matter of education.

I have considered this amendment in connection with the bill; I have asked the judgment of gentlemen in whom I have confidence, and I do find, according to all the judgment that I have obtained, according to the best opinion that I can make up, that it discriminates between the white people and the colored people of the South. It discriminates in favor of the colored people; and the moment that the Federal Government undertakes to do that it will justify what States may do, and what some have done.

These are the only remarks, sir, that I wish to make. I hope there will be no discrimination in the bill. Let this fund go to the States, and let it be distributed not according to color, but as the bill itself now provides, according to the illiteracy found in the States.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HALE. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope that motion will not be pressed at this time, and that it will not prevail if it is pressed, because it is very necessary that we should get on with the bill to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable. The question is agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Maine, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BUTLER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1649) for the relief of William M. Bryant, of Washington city, D. C.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1650) to provide for the establishment of a port of entry at Semiahmoo, in the Territory of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McPHERSON introduced a bill (S. 1651) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make final adjustment of claims of certain foreign steamship companies arising from the illegal exaction of tonnage dues; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, introduced a bill (S. 1652) to regulate the forms of bills of lading and the duties and liabilities of ship-owners and others; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After forty-two minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

EXECUTIVE NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received the 26th day of February, 1886.

ASSISTANT UNITED STATES TREASURER.

William Wayland Sutton, of Ohio, to be assistant treasurer of the United States at Cincinnati, Ohio, to correct error in name.

JUSTICE OF THE PEACE.

Luke C. Strider, of the District of Columbia, to be a justice of the peace within and for the said District, vice Hillman A. Hall, resigned.

POSTMASTERS.

Chester Johnson, at Thompsonville, Hartford County, Connecticut, vice Agnes Stewart, commission expired.

Edward P. King, at Hawkinsville, Pulaski County, Georgia, vice H. H. Whitfield, deceased.

Frank Chapman, at Fenton, Genesee County, Michigan, vice Dexter Horton, commission expired.

Mary Houston Gillespie, at Aberdeen, Monroe County, Mississippi, vice James W. Lee, resigned.

Thomas W. Poindexter, at Dillon, Beaver Head County, Montana, vice John T. Yoe, resigned.

Frank Kneedler, at Phillipsburgh, Warren County, New Jersey, vice John J. B. Reiley, whose commission expired February 6, 1886.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 26, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PRINTING AND BINDING FOR DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of State of an appropriation for printing and binding for the Department of State for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

CLERICAL FORCE, INDIAN OFFICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an amended estimate from the Secretary of the Interior of an appropriation for clerical force in the Indian Office for the next fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HUMBOLDT HARBOR, CALIFORNIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Light-House Board recommending an appropriation for the removal of the light-house at the entrance to Humboldt Harbor, California, and for the purchase of a new site; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

APPROPRIATION FOR UNITED STATES MINT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Director of the Mint recommending an increase in the estimate of an appropriation for workmen for the next fiscal year from $150,000 to $170,000; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

WATER-TANK, FREEDMAN'S HOSPITAL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of the Interior of an appropriation to repair the water-tank at the Freedmen's Hospital, Washington, D. C.; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

QUARTERMASTER'S DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting additional estimates from the Secretary of War of appropriations for the service of the Quartermaster's Department, United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

J. W. MERRIMAN, UNITED STATES CONSUL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State recommending an appropriation to reimburse J. W. Merriman, United States consul at Iquique, Peru, for loss of Government funds by fire; which was referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF ARKANSAS RIVER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report from the Chief of Engineers of an examination and survey by Capt. H. S. Taber, of the Corps of Engineers, of Arkansas River from Fort Gibson to Wichita, Kans.; which was referred to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

SIGNAL SERVICE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from the Chief Signal Officer recommending a change in the wording of the estimate for the support of the Signal Service for the next fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SENATE BILLS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bills of the following titles; which were severally read a first and second time, and referred as indicated below:

A bill (S. 877) for the relief of Robert H. Anderson, of the State of Georgia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

A bill (S. 1100) to amend the ninth section of an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1885—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

A bill (S. 1476) to amend the act of Congress approved June 12, 1884, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of bridges across the Wisconsin, Chippewa, and Saint Croix Rivers, in the State of Wisconsin"—to the Committee on Commerce.

STATUES OF COLUMBUS, LAFAYETTE, AND GARFIELD.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a joint resolution (S. R. 35) setting apart public reservations for statues to Columbus, Lafayette, and James A. Garfield; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

HOT-WATER PRIVILEGES AT HOT SPRINGS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following concurrent resolution of the Senate; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

Whereas the leases heretofore made of the bath-house and hot-water privileges upon the reservation of Government lands at Hot Springs, Ark., have expired by limitation of law; and

Whereas the Attorney-General of the United States has given an opinion that such leases may be renewed by the Secretary of the Interior without additional legislation:

Be it resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That in the opinion of Congress such leases of bath-house and hot-water privileges should not be renewed by the Secretary of the Interior unless the Forty-ninth Congress shall adjourn without having legislated with reference thereto.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LINDSLEY, for two days.

To Mr. LEHLBACH, until Friday next, on account of important business.

LIGHTS AND SIGNALS.

Mr. LONG, by unanimous consent, presented the following resolution of the American Ophthalmological Society, concerning lights and signals; which was read, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

The following resolution is, by vote of the American Ophthalmological Society, at its twenty-first annual meeting, July 16, 1885, presented to the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Voted, That the society would again express most hearty approval of the international commission twice recommended in a bill reported by the Naval Committee of Congress, and indorsed by the international medical congress, London, 1881; to consider and agree upon standard colored lights and signals, &c., and the visual power and color sense of officers and sailors.

The society would particularly support the international congress vote that "every government, especially the maritime governments, should be requested to place one or more members on the commission, and chiefly experienced naval officers and medical specialists."

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

O. T. WADSWORTH, Secretary.

TELEPHONE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. MORRISON. I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 15, 1886.

Mr. HANBACK submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

"Whereas grave charges have been made and are constantly being made by the leading press of the country reflecting upon the integrity and official action of certain officers of the Government of the United States: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That a special committee, consisting of eleven members of this House, be appointed, and when so appointed said committee is hereby directed, at as early a day as possible, to make inquiry into any expenditures upon the part of the Government incurred relative to the rights of the Bell and Pan-Electric Telephone Companies to priority of patents; said inquiry to include all organizations and companies which have sprung from the Pan-Electric Telephone Company, or for any other purpose; and also to make full inquiry into the issuance of the stock known as the "Pan-Electric Telephone stock," or any stock of any company, or companies, or organizations springing out of the Pan-Electric Telephone Company, to any person or persons connected at the time of such issuance with either the legislative, judicial, or executive departments of the Government of the United States; to whom, when, where, or in what amounts, and for what consideration in money, service, or influence, said stock, if any, was delivered; also as to what opinions, decisions, and orders relating to said stock have been made by any officers connected with the Government, and by whom, and all the circumstances connected therewith and arising therefrom; and also as to what suit or suits, if any, have been brought in the name of the United States to test the validity of patents issued, or any other right in controversy between the Bell and the Pan-Electric Telephone Companies; what contracts have been made, what moneys paid or to be paid to any person or persons as assistant counsel to the Attorney-General or Solicitor-General of the United States; the reason and authority for constituting the United States as a party to said suit or suits, and all matters connected therewith; and to the end that the people of the United States may be fully advised, the committee is granted the right to send for persons and papers, to sit in session during the sessions of the House, to employ a stenographer, and to incur any and all reasonable and necessary expenditures as may be deemed requisite for the purposes of such investigation, such expenditures to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House."

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 15, 1886.

Mr. PULITZER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Rules:

"Resolved, That the resolution creating a select committee, proposed by Mr. HANBACK, of Kansas, be so amended as to authorize said committee to inquire whether any of the telephone companies have in any way influenced or attempted to influence officials or official action through newspapers acting from interested and improper motives. And also whether any corporations or their managers or representatives contributed large sums of money for political campaign purposes upon the agreement that a certain person acceptable to them should be appointed a judge of one of the courts of the United States which may have to decide litigation concerning telephone suits."

The Committee on Rules, to which were referred the two resolutions hereto attached, have had the same under consideration, and now report them back to the House with the recommendation that the resolution proposing an investigation of the facts concerning the alleged issue of stock by the Pan-Electric Telephone Company, and other companies and organizations connected with it, to public officials be amended by striking out the word "special," in the first line of the resolution, and inserting the word "select," and by striking out the word "eleven," in the second line, and inserting the word "nine;" so that the committee will consist of nine members instead of eleven, as in the proposed resolution.

The committee also recommend that the said resolution be further amended by striking out all after the word "therewith," in the seventh line, on the third page of the resolution, and inserting the following in lieu thereof:

"And the said committee is further authorized and directed to ascertain and report whether either of the telephone companies herein mentioned, or their officers, agents, or employés, have in any manner improperly influenced or attempted to influence officials or official action by or through the public press; and, if so, when, by whom, and in what manner such influence was exerted, or attempted to be exerted, and what newspaper or newspapers were so used or attempted to be used by them.

"The said committee shall have the right to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to sit during the session of the House, to employ a stenographer, and incur any and all such necessary and reasonable expenses as may be required for the purpose of conducting the said investigation, not to exceed the sum of $1,000, which shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, upon proper vouchers, certified by the chairman and one other member of the committee; and may report at any time."

The committee recommend the passage of the resolution with these amendments, and that the other resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, is this resolution debatable?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] is entitled to the floor upon his report; and unless the previous question should be demanded, and ordered by the House, the report is debatable.

Mr. MORRISON. I demand the previous question. After it is ordered we will hear what the gentleman from West Virginia has to say.

The SPEAKER. If the previous question should be ordered without prior debate, under the rules of the House thirty minutes will be allowed for debate, fifteen minutes for the report and fifteen minutes against it.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I would like to oppose the report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from West Virginia to control the time in opposition to the report and the gentleman from Illinois to control the time in support of it.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, this is the unanimous report of the Committee on Rules. The amendments proposed are intended to embrace in one resolution all the committee found in both which was deemed essential. I do not propose to anticipate anything by discussing this subject before we have the information on which intelligent discussion may be based. We propose that a select committee shall examine and make full report upon this question. If the gentleman from West Virginia has anything to say I am willing he shall proceed now. I will, however, reserve my time, to be used afterward should I deem it necessary.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, it is with extreme reluctance that I undertake to oppose a resolution prepared and reported to this House by gentlemen for whom I have so much respect as I have for the authors of this report. But I feel that I, as well as they, have a duty to perform to my constituents and to the country; and I am unwilling to sit here and see this body drifting into an investigation that can not bring respect to it, confidence to the country, or any good to any human being.

There has never yet been made such a charge against any person occupying an official position in connection with this matter as to justify the trial of any man before any tribunal in this country. A gentleman who is a member of this House—I refer to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PULITZER], himself the editor of a paper—did not see fit in his official capacity as a member of Congress to attack these gentlemen in the open, honest, and manly way that a Representative ought to have done, but undertook to retreat behind the irresponsible columns of his paper for the purpose of creating a scandal—for what motives I am not here to say.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend from West Virginia will remember that the gentleman referred to is not now present in his seat.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I can not help that, Mr. Speaker. I remember that he ought to be here. I remember that gentlemen who have lived a long life and established an honorable reputation by their integrity and capacity, gentlemen who have won the confidence of the whole country, are being arraigned by this irresponsible newspaper clamor, and the Democratic majority in this House, under the influence of this hue and cry, are rushing to do that which must only do these gentlemen injustice.

There is not a charge embraced in one of these resolutions. They do not charge there has been any corrupt official act done by any one of these parties. They do not charge the Attorney-General has given a corrupt decision or that the Secretary of the Interior has given a corrupt decision. They do not charge that a dollar of money has been illegally expended. On the contrary, they refrain with wonderful facility from making any such charge.

All that has been done in this telephone matter has been to refer it to the courts. Let the courts decide whether it was properly referred or not. If properly referred, what has this Congress to do with the question of its reference?

Ah, but it is said these gentlemen some time or other got stock. I stood on this floor and heard a member of this body boast that he owned hundreds and thousands of railroad stock, and that he would combine with the railroads to defy the laws of the country by clogging up the courts, and no outcry was made against it. I stand here and see all around me men who own railroad stock, men who own stock in national banks, voting, with their stock in their pockets, on these questions, and no outcry is raised against it. I remember the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT], himself one of the great manufacturers of the country, is at work, and has been at work all the time, to revive the tariff, so that his manufactures might become more profitable. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.] I remember one of the gentlemen on the Coinage Committee, a gentleman from South Carolina, is a member of the national bank. Indeed, you may turn all round and you will find members on this floor who are members of national banks.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Not in fifteen minutes.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Did they pay for their stock, or was it given to them gratuitously? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. I will answer that question. It is no matter whether they paid for it or it was given to them gratuitously; the question is, have they got that stock, honestly or dishonestly. It is altogether a childish question to ask what they gave for their stock, for that has nothing at all to do with the matter.

How many members in this House, Mr. Speaker, own national-bank stock? How many own railroad stock? If I am not misinformed the late President of the Senate was himself the honored counsel of one of these telephone companies. Who cried out against that? If I am correctly informed the present President of the Senate is a national-bank stockholder. Who cries out against that?

Mr. CUTCHEON. Was his stock presented to him?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Does that make the fraud? Do you not know that it is not the manner in which the stock was come by, but the action influenced by the stock?

Mr. CUTCHEON. But that fact signifies something.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Oh, yes, it signifies a good deal when you have nothing else to do but to arraign the character of most honorable gentlemen against whose record you can say nothing.

Now, sir, this committee reports, if it reports anything, these gentlemen got stock without paying anything for it. Is that wrong? Who is going to say that is wrong? If we are going to undertake to hold ourselves responsible for not paying our constituents for all they have done for us, how many of us would be bankrupt? They can not report that they came by their stock wrongfully. That is a matter we have nothing to do with. The question is, Have they been corruptly influenced in their conduct? Nobody pretends it.

It resolves itself down, therefore, to the pitiful scene of the American Congress going into an investigation as to a question of taste. You can do nothing with these men on these charges. You can only decide, if you can decide anything, that some may have received stock in that way. That is the whole sum and substance of this investigation.

I am not standing as a champion of this administration or of these men. I am frank to say, while I consider the honesty and cleanliness of this administration as being equal to any that we have ever had, I have but little regard for its politics. [Laughter on the Republican side.] But I am here to protest against this Congress, I am here to protest against the Democratic majority, going into an investigation which can reflect no credit upon it and which can do no good.

If any gentleman wishes to make charges against these men, if the Attorney-General, who has built himself up by his integrity and capacity, is to be assaulted, let him be assaulted at least with the certainty you would a chicken-thief. If you wish to attack Joseph E. Johnston, who is not a member of Congress, and was not when this stock was received by him, let him at least be assaulted with some of the manliness and boldness that a soldier of reputation deserves. And if you wish to attack Lamar, or Atkins, or any other man, let it be done in a manly, straightforward way; but do not let men go behind the irresponsible columns of a newspaper to assassinate the character of men while we stand by to help them by giving countenance to their assaults.

Then you want to go further; you are not satisfied with that only; but the newspapers that make this report and publish it to the country must be investigated; you propose that Congress must investigate that question also and report whether or not they have been paid anything.

Now, are we not entering upon a magnificent field of investigation? Are we not entering upon a field of investigation in which it is not only impossible to accomplish anything, but which would be absolutely ridiculous in its results on any report the committee could make? How can you go into a general investigation of the newspapers? Can you arraign all of them that published anything about the matter? Can you go into every Congressional district and find out which newspaper brought the most influence to bear upon its member of Congress? It is utterly impossible. They can do nothing whatever. It is futile, therefore, to enter upon an investigation of this matter.

But, Mr. Speaker, there has been already one investigation of this subject, and the committee that investigated it reported that but $38.50 have been expended by the Government. That report was made unanimously and agreed to by the author of these resolutions. But that is not sufficient.

Do not gentlemen know that you can not deal with this sort of insinuation or slander without giving it more or less reputation? You have only to bring charges against anybody, man or woman, let the community take it up, discuss it, open your investigating committee, either in church or out of it, and you blacken and damn the best character in the land, and do it on a foul and cowardly insinuation that men do not dare to make openly.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to follow or imitate the gentleman from West Virginia in speaking of what is involved in this matter before I know what are the actual facts. It is the purpose of this report to ascertain these facts, that we may act upon them and deal with them in a fitting or becoming manner.

A member of this House arose in his place and presented resolutions demanding an investigation of matters affecting the official conduct of an officer or officers of the Government——

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Let me suggest that the gentleman made no charges. He simply stated that it was currently reported in the newspapers.

Mr. MORRISON. Any gentleman rising in his place here on his responsibility as a member presenting a question of this character, whether he gets the facts upon which he bases his action from the newspapers or from the gentleman from West Virginia, makes charges and is responsible for them. Upon his responsibility as a member of this House he says substantially that he believes there is reason for the investigation because of the charges; that he believes in the truth of the matter he presents and the alleged facts upon which the charges are founded. Any gentleman who would ask for an investigation without such belief is hardly fit to be here; for one I am unwilling to assume there is any such member here.

This investigation having been demanded by a member of the House, the Committee on Rules, and every member of that committee, thought it improper to refuse it, and as a political friend of the officer supposed to be most affected, if anybody is to be affected by the investigation, having unlimited confidence in his honor, his personal and official integrity, I want this resolution passed, that the investigation may go on, that the facts may be known and justice done.

Mr. ROGERS. I ask a single moment.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas for a moment.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I think I can safely say that no gentleman who is supposed to be affected by these charges will, in the slightest degree, welcome the opposition which the gentleman from West Virginia has seen fit to make against the report of the Committee on Rules.

For my own part, and speaking for myself alone, I welcome this resolution with all my heart. I have but one regret to express, and that is, that I think it possible it might have been made broader, and if it could be made broader I am sure that I will meet the desires of those gentlemen when I say that I would welcome it in all its length and breadth and in every direction. For myself, therefore, I repeat, I welcome the resolution and hope this investigation will be made thorough and searching, with a view of ascertaining every fact for and against every party who may be directly or indirectly affected by these assertions of the newspapers.

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Allow me a word.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. BRECKINRIDGE].

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, I do not think that it would have been seemly in the Attorney-General or in his friends to demand an investigation because of charges made through the press of the country; but I do think, when a gentleman, a member of the House, rises in his place, as has been done here, and approaches this question in any manner that is at all serious, that then the friends of the Attorney-General and his political associates, while still they may not ask an investigation, yet they can with propriety welcome one that is instigated from an unfriendly source or from a suspecting source.

This is no time to discuss the merits of the case for which we propose to appoint a committee to gather evidence; but every allusion that is made by a member of the House upon the merits of the case is entitled at least to some consideration. The suggestion has been thrown out that the Attorney-General got his stock in this telephone company as a gift, and in the remarks which have been made by his friends upon the floor to-day no allusion has been made to that point. I would not have the country believe that any of us who come from the State from which the distinguished official comes, that any of us who are proud to call ourselves his personal friends as well as his political associates have any soreness upon that point, as one that will not bear probing and the most searching scrutiny. It is not asserted that even if it were a gift, which I utterly deny, that it contemplated or in any way could contemplate influencing him in his official conduct, and I have never seen any attempt to prove that, in all the outcry we have heard, which I do not mean to characterize.

I am utterly ignorant of the whole status of the case if he did not acquire the stock that he did acquire in the usual and customary manner of acquiring such stocks.

Without proposing to go with any fullness into the question, I will simply say that every gentleman knows that when patent companies are incorporated the value of the stock depends upon the value of the inventive idea, and they frequently pay an income, if the patent be successful, upon enormous volumes of stock, and yet let the manufacturing of the invention be done by other capital and parties, the company simply selling the royalties. He subscribed for the stock and made himself liable to assessments as every subscriber is liable to assessments; and I am utterly ignorant of the fact if he acquired it in any way other than that in which such stocks are always acquired by incorporators. And I am happy to say I am firm in the belief that the country will see clearly that this is a case to be tried by the courts and not by the Attorney-General; that his skirts have been perfectly free of all instigation or encouragement of any litigation that could possibly accrue to his advantage, and that the company which, while a Senator, he entered as a stockholder, as any other citizen could enter, was and is one which never could come before Congress for favorable legislation; and that he in no wise in his official capacity could influence the value of the stock any more than if he were a shareholder in a piece of real estate in the city of New York or in his own State or had any other property that could come before the courts of the country. We are not sore upon the point, and I trust the case will be fully investigated.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORGAN. Upon what principle can this House without lowering its dignity go into an investigation of loose charges made by a newspaper?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. I think that question is hardly before the House.

Mr. MORGAN. Has anybody made official charges here?

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. No charges have been officially made.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED].

Mr. REED. I appreciate the natural feeling of solemnity which has fallen upon the Democratic party at this moment. To be stopped in the midst of a career of great and well-advertised purity—to be stopped in the midst of a career which had for its motto the turning out of "rascals;" to be obliged to stop and consider the question whether by some accident instead of turning them out they had not got in—is of course painful. [Laughter.] I do not intend to detract from the solemnity of the occasion by discussing prematurely the results of this investigation. I only wish to tender, in passing, to the Democratic party the assurances of the respectful consideration which we all have for their situation. [Laughter.] For a long time they have been busy filling the atmosphere with observations which have been the result of the action of Congressional investigating committees. The poisoned chalice returned to their own lips seems a shade bitter, I notice. I desire also in passing to express the very slight opinion which I have of the results of Congressional investigation, although I hope in common with all citizens of the Republic who are proud of its history and its possibilities that the result of this investigation may show that public officials have been wrongly charged.

But it is desirable under the fierce onslaughts of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] to say a few words in defense of the resolution. I think I even ought to defend the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] who is absent, by suggesting that the gentleman from West Virginia is mistaken in supposing that the gentleman from New York is here for the purpose of building up his own industry. I think he is here for the purpose of attempting to break down other people's industries. [Laughter.]

Now, as for this investigation, here is a charge based upon statements which have thus far not been denied, that a gentleman who occupies a high public position had received, while a Senator of the United States, stock in a company, the par value of which, at least, was enormous, and for no other reason apparent thus far than because he did occupy that prominent position. It turns out also that he has published an opinion declaring that the Pan-Electric patents in no respect infringed upon the Bell patents, and that, I understand, without announcing his connection with the company. But upon that I may be mistaken; that may be cleared up, and certainly ought to be.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. Will the gentleman permit me to say that he was published in the prospectus of the company in which that opinion was published as the attorney of the company?

Mr. REED, of Maine. Then I desire to say this same official, who has declared that the Bell patent was not infringed upon by the Pan-Electric patent, yet refused as Attorney-General to decide upon the annulment of the Bell patent, because he was interested in the Pan-Electric patent. Now if the Pan-Electric patent did not infringe upon the Bell patent, where was he interested? In these matters I do not mean to state that what I have said is in any way final. I only say that these are matters which it is not unreasonable that both sides should desire to have investigated, and the friends of the Attorney-General have stated their wish and his wish and those on the other side have stated theirs, and there seems to remain solitary and alone the gentleman from West Virginia as the sole conspicuous figure on this occasion.

Mr. MORRISON resumed the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] has one minute of his time remaining. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GIBSON] has two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. MORRISON. I want to use the minute that remains to me in disabusing the mind of the honorable gentleman from Maine in supposing the Democratic party is in any trouble. We propose to investigate charges against our own people as we did against theirs; and I trust if we find them guilty of anything unbecoming honest officials we will not be found, as some of the gentlemen were on the other side, attempting to shield them. [Applause.]

Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I not only concede to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] that our desire is to turn the rascals out, but I desire to inform him that my object now is to stop the rascals from talking. Now, Mr. Speaker, as I said before, I am not here as a representative of any of the gentlemen concerned in this matter. I have not consulted their wishes. I am here as the representative of my constituency upon this floor. I am consulting the dignity of this House, I am consulting common justice and humanity, when I undertake to stand here to prevent this Congress, if possible, from rushing into a futile and senseless investigation that can do it no good, neither party good, nor good to the men they propose to investigate. I have no doubt those gentlemen, knowing their own honesty and knowing that they have been upright in all these transactions, would court investigation, but are we here to investigate every man who wants his character established? Are we here to investigate every man whom somebody else wants to blacken? I am opposing these resolutions because they contain no charge; I am opposing them because they are not founded upon any authority and because they do not comport with the dignity of this House.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, has the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] any time left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has exhausted his time.

Mr. ROGERS. Then I ask unanimous consent of the House to make a single remark which will not be offensive to anybody.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana, and Mr. REED, of Maine. I hope it will be granted.

Mr. ROGERS. What I wish to say is in response to the query of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED], who asked why it was that Mr. Garland could not appear in the prosecution of this suit. The answer to that is, that long before he became Attorney-General he was the published general counsel of the Pan-Electric Company. In addition to that, as I understand the fact, this litigation was brought about at the instance, in part, of the Pan-Electric Company, of which Mr. Garland was then a stockholder. Therefore, having at a former period been counsel of the company, and being a stockholder also, at the time of the institution of the suit for the cancellation of the Bell patent he could not, upon grounds of professional ethics, appear in that case at all. So that if to-day he were completely relieved of every dollar of stock that he owns in that company, and had no longer any interest in it, still it does not occur to me that, with due regard to professional ethics, he could appear at all in the pending litigation.

Mr. DUNN. Will my colleague permit me to correct him on one point?

Mr. ROGERS. I will if I am mistaken.

Mr. DUNN. You said "this litigation;" the litigation now pending was not begun at the instance of any telephone company, but at the instance of the Government. The first suit was begun at the instance of a number of companies, but this litigation was not, and no telephone company has anything to do with it except the Bell company, which is defending.

Mr. ROGERS. I simply desire to convey this idea, that as I understand it this whole effort to cancel the Bell patent was brought about by and grew out of the suit which was instituted at Memphis after Mr. Garland had become the general published counsel of the Pan-Electric Company and was also a stockholder, and that, therefore, professional ethics forbade his appearing in this litigation at any stage in the proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported from the Committee on Rules. Are separate votes upon the amendments demanded? If not, the vote will be taken in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was then adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MONOPOLY OF TELEGRAPHIC FACILITIES.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Accounts.

The report was read, as follows:

"IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 1, 1886.

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads is hereby empowered to ascertain whether additional legislation is needed to prevent a monopoly of telegraphic facilities, to secure to the Southern, Western, and Pacific States the benefits of competition between telegraph companies, and to protect the people of the United States from unreasonable charges for telegraphic services. Said committee is hereby authorized to send for and examine persons, books, and papers, to administer the oath to witnesses, and to employ a stenographer; and the expenses of such investigation, not to exceed a total of $2,500, are hereby authorized to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House in the manner now provided by law."

This resolution was reported favorably from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads and referred to the Committee on Accounts for consideration as to the expenditure authorized to be made from the contingent fund of the House. The object of the resolution is to enable the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads to inquire into the relation of the land-grant railroads to certain telegraph lines, and to ascertain whether the conditions under which land grants were made to such roads, and bonds issued by which telegraphic lines were to be constructed and maintained by such roads, are being complied with. To do this, in the opinion of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post Roads, it may become necessary to send for persons and papers, and to examine witnesses under oath. The Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads having recommended to the House that this authority be given to it, the Committee on Accounts respectfully report the resolution back with the recommendation that the expenditure from the contingent fund, or so much thereof as may be necessary, not to exceed $1,500, be authorized.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, the report, I think, shows very clearly the purpose of the resolution. If any one desires further explanation, I will yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON], the author of the resolution, to make it; but, if not, I shall demand the previous question on the adoption of the amendment and the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered. The amendment was agreed to, and the resolution as amended was then adopted.

Mr. DOCKERY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNES, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. 5893) to provide for certain of the most urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROGERS. I reserve all points of order on this bill.

SMOKING IN THE HALL.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read clause 7 of Rule XIV.

The Clerk read as follows:

While the Speaker is putting a question or addressing the House no member shall walk out of or across the Hall, nor, when a member is speaking, pass between him and the Chair; and during the session of the House no member shall wear his hat, or remain by the Clerk's desk during the call of the roll or the counting of ballots, or smoke upon the floor of the House; and the Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper are charged with the strict enforcement of this clause

The SPEAKER. Complaint is made that this rule is violated by smoking upon the floor of the House. The Chair hopes that gentlemen will observe the rules, because the air of the House unfortunately is bad enough at any rate. The officers of the House will see that this rule is respected.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being Friday, the Chair will proceed to call the committees for reports of a private nature.

CHANGES OF REFERENCE.

On motion of Mr. BRAGG, by unanimous consent the Committee on Military Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of bills of the following titles; which were respectively referred as indicated:

On motion of Mr. HITT, the bill with adverse recommendation was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ALEXANDER WORRALL.

Mr. GEDDES, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back with amendments the bill (H. R. 4476) for the relief of Alexander Worrall; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of the standing and select committees.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar. The Clerk will report the first bill.

JAMES MILLINGER.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1217) for the relief of James Millinger.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to examine into, ascertain, and determine the value of property appropriated by the United States forces, belonging to James Millinger, while engaged in the lumber and planing-mill business, at Nashville, Tenn., during the years 1862, 1863, 1864, and 1865, and also the loss said Millinger sustained on account of the military occupation of the Overton House, in said city, during said years; and the sum of $22,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of War to adjust and the accounting officers of the Treasury to pay said Millinger the amount of his said losses, as allowed and approved under authority of this act: Provided, That the award of the Secretary of War for such losses shall be final, and the payment thereof shall be held and taken as a complete relinquishment and satisfaction of all claim for damages sustained by him as aforesaid.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the reading of the report.

The report (by Mr. PERRY) is as follows:

The claimant alleges that he was a loyal citizen, residing at Pittsburgh, Pa., in 1860, when he entered into a partnership with Robert McClay to carry on the lumber and planing-mill business at Nashville, Tenn. The style of the firm was Robert McClay & Co., and they erected at Edgefield, Tenn., a steam saw-mill, which cost them $13,000.

It is alleged that in April, 1860, the said firm contracted with John Overton, of Nashville, Tenn., to build a large hotel there; that the work was well under way when the war commenced, and was continued till the capture of Nashville by the United States troops under General Buell; that in September, 1862, said hotel was taken by the United States forces, and held and used as barracks by United States troops till September, 1865, thus preventing said firm from completing the building according to contract.

It is also alleged that the United States forces took possession of the said saw-mill early in 1862, and ran the same one hundred and fifty-eight days, and consumed 50,000 feet of lumber and saw-logs belonging to said firm.

It is alleged that on the return of Overton from the rebellion, in February, 1865, he took the oath of allegiance, and received from the Government rent for the use of said hotel after that time.

Claimant applied to the War Department for relief, and the Qurtermaster-General referred the matter to General Thomas Sands, who instructed General George W. Marshall, at Nashville, to investigate and report thereon. He reported as follows:

ASSISTANT QUARTERMASTER-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Nashville, January 31, 1867.

Respectfully returned with the information that the case has been carefully and thoroughly investigated. Mr. Millinger having failed to furnish any memoranda or statement of articles lost or destroyed on account of the military occupation of the building, we called upon his attorney in this city, who made the inclosed statement, which is taken from the chancery court records in this city, and set forth in a suit brought by him, or firm to which he belonged, against Overton.

This statement has been submitted to the most reliable architects, builders, and mechanics in this city, and they inform me that the prices charged were low at the time the articles were furnished, and much below what it would cost to replace them. By examination of the affidavit of Charles Ferguson, taken in the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., and used as evidence in the suit in chancery, we find that the articles enumerated in George W. Jenkins's communication were shipped to this place by Millinger, and were placed in the Overton House, and that he (Millinger) purchased all the interest in this claim from his partner, assuming all responsibility for the indebtedness of the firm by virtue of their contract for the construction of this building. Careful investigation shows that at the time the military took possession of the building Millinger (or his firm) had in said building—

540 doors and trimmings, worth	$5,654 75
670 windows and trimmings, worth	12,573 00
Base-boards and grounds, worth	1,668 00
Total value of property	19,893 75

All these articles were destroyed by the soldiers quartered in said building.

Undoubtedly Mr. Millinger's claim for $19,893.75 is just and right, and $22,000 would not replace the articles destroyed.

GEO. W. MARSHALL,
Brevet Major-General and Assistant Quartermaster General.

Received at the Assistant Quartermaster-General's Office, Louisville, February 4, 1867. Respectfully returned to the Quartermaster-General. Attention invited to the foregoing indorsement:

THOMAS SANDS,
Assistant-Quartermaster, U. S. A.

The War Department decided that it had no authority to pay the claim. The claimant then filed a claim before the commissioners of claims, and this tribunal held that it had no jurisdiction of the case.

The claimant alleges that McClay's interest in the contract was assigned to him, but furnishes no evidence of such assignment. There is no evidence to show the amount of work that had been done upon the hotel. There is no evidence to show what the claimants's interest was in the property of the firm of R. McClay & Co.

It seems that an investigation by the Secretary of War is a matter of necessity before intelligent action can be had upon this case.

The committee therefore report the accompanying bill for his relief, with recommendation that it pass.

Mr. PERRY. I think that the principal facts upon which this bill is based are sufficiently set forth in the report of the committee. I do not know that I could add anything to it, and unless there is some opposition I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. HOUK. I would like to ask the gentleman in charge of this bill a question. I imperfectly heard the reading of the report, but, as I understand it, this is in effect to provide payment for property destroyed in the Zollicoffer barracks, Nashville?

Mr. PERRY. No, sir; in the Overton House.

Mr. HOUK. Well, it is the same building.

Mr. NEGLEY. I think the question as to the facts in this case, with permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, can be answered in a very few words.

This property, Mr. Chairman, was destroyed by the Federal troops. It was property which was in the building at the time of its occupation by the troops of the United States. This building was taken possession of and occupied by a portion of my command, and this man——

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield for a question?

Mr. NEGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Does not the report state the fact that Mr. Overton was paid for the rent of the building, and this claim is made now for property—doors, windows, sashes, and other materials destroyed by the Federal troops while occupying the building?

Mr. NEGLEY. I know nothing of the destruction of the property or the data upon which the committee made its report.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. The report of the Assistant Quartermaster-General, as shown here, sets out that—

All these articles were destroyed by the soldiers quartered in said building.

The claim is for some $19,893.

Mr. NEGLEY. It is altogether possible that the property was destroyed.

Mr. HOUK. Now, Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOUK. I was wondering how the gentleman got the floor away from me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was under the impression that the gentleman from Tennessee had yielded the floor, and recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HOUK. Very well.

Mr. NEGLEY. I thought the gentleman was seeking information and desired to give it to him. From the fact that my command occupied a portion of this building, and perhaps all of it, for the period covered by this claim, and possibly did destroy this property, I am sure Mr. Millinger is the loser.

He was in Pittsburgh, unable to go there and protect his property, and for months it was occupied by the troops with the presumption that Mr. Overton was in the Southern confederacy and an enemy of the country, and they had very little respect consequently for his property. Later on Mr. Millinger made an effort to obtain pay. Failing in that, he now appeals to Congress, and all I need say is, the claim is a just one. Mr. Millinger is an honest man, and he has waited for years for this small contribution toward a large loss.

Mr. HOUK. I did not seek the floor with the view of antagonizing this bill except conditionally. From the reading of the report and the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY] it appears this is a bill seeking payment for property not delivered to or used by the Army, but destroyed in the exigencies of war. Now, I am as liberal as any man ought to be, and I am perfectly willing to vote for this bill on condition that all other claimants who were loyal to the country shall be paid on precisely the same conditions. But, sir, for the past seven years, and how long before I do not know, when one of my constituents, or some Union man from the South, where it cost something to be a friend of this Government in those days, comes here and presents a claim for property under precisely the same circumstances we are told that the Government does not pay for property destroyed in the progress of the war.

I therefore desire to say, and have only sought the floor for the purpose of saying, that if the Committee on War Claims and this House propose to lay down the rule to pay all persons alike for this class of property which was destroyed I will vote for it, but I am unwilling to stand here and see my constituents and the people in the border States every day repelled from Congress and from the Departments on the ground that their property was destroyed in the processes of war, and then stand here and see a man, because forsooth he comes from the other side of the line, paid for his property destroyed under precisely the same circumstances. It is unfair. It is unjust. It is not treating all alike. If this report is correct this bill ought not to pass unless this House is ready to say to every claimant who can place himself before Congress as loyal and whose property was destroyed—unless this House is ready to say to all such "come on with your claims, and all will fare alike and all will be paid alike." I am in favor of that and will support this bill if you pass it with that understanding.

This is about all I want to say. Let us do justice in these matters. Let us be entirely fair to these claimants. Let us understand what we are doing. This report says this property was destroyed, when from the report nobody knows what became of it, except that it was destroyed.

Mr. STEELE. Do you know it was destroyed?

Mr. HOUK. We do not know from the report what became of it. It was there, and then it was not there. But what I want to call the attention of the House to, and to emphasize it, is that it is not right to treat men from one side of the line in this country one way and men from the other side of the line in another way. I know my constituents are constantly repelled, men who were as loyal as anybody, men who were in the United States service at the time their property was taken. Colleges in my country, that were used and occupied precisely like this hotel, were used for barracks, used for hospitals, used for various army purposes, the very colleges which sent out and built up the loyal sentiment in my country that made the people adhere to the Union come here and ask pay for their property destroyed in this way, and they are repelled constantly, and told it was destroyed in the progress of the war, and that it is not the policy of the Government to pay for it.

Mr. NEGLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOUK. Yes, sir.

Mr. NEGLEY. Have there not been millions of dollars paid to Southern claimants upon many claims where the evidence was of a very doubtful character? To my own knowledge there have been millions of dollars paid for cotton and other Southern products.

Mr. HOUK. Possibly there have been. There are two millions of dollars due to the people of Tennessee for property with a better foundation than this case has and where the parties have not the face to ask for pay.

Mr. NEGLEY. I know the gentleman tries to be fair——

Mr. HOUK. I try to be.

Mr. NEGLEY. Then I suggest to him that he should treat each case on its merits. I am sure he has not examined this case carefully. If he did so, he would not make the assertion that there are any claims now pending more meritorious than this one.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The claimant in this case resides near my own home. He is old, broken down, and penniless. He has with him a blind wife. They are supported by the daily wages of a son at the hardest of manual toil. At the breaking out of the war he was a man of means, and extensively engaged in business; and residing in Pittsburg, he had upon his hands a contract for the erection of a building in Nashville.

During the erection of that building, and before it was turned over to the owner, the war broke out, and the unoccupied building was taken possession of by the United States troops, and this gentleman has never been able from that day to this to recover from the owner of the building for the work done or the material furnished in the erection of that building, because of the technical defense that he did not complete the work within the time specified in the contract.

The owner of that building in Nashville, Tenn., has the fruits of this man's toil to-day; so that in a contest of equity between inhabitants of Tennessee and the people of other portions of the country there is that to be taken into consideration.

Mr. HOUK. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOUK. You say that the owner of this building in Nashville has the fruits of this claimant's toil.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOUK. Then why do you ask the Government to pay for John Overton's building?

Mr. BUCHANAN. We do not ask the Government to pay for these fruits of this claimant's toil, but we do ask it to pay for other things which the Government got the benefit of. We do not, in this bill, ask the Government to pay a cent for the erection of the building, but at the time it was taken possession of by the troops there were in it, according to the report of the agent of the Quartermaster's Department, made shortly after and never disputed, five hundred and forty doors and trimmings, six hundred and seventy windows and trimmings, and a lot of base-boards and grounds. Those had been put in that building ready to be placed in position, but were not yet in position, and they were used by the troops that were quartered in the building. The men took the doors and the window-frames to boil their coffee with. And now shall this great Government of ours say to this man that he shall not be paid for that material which was taken and used by the troops of the Government for such purposes? This property was destroyed, part of it in that way and part of it in another; but the agent of the Quartermaster's Department has reported that these materials were in the building at the time, and I quote the words of the report: "All these articles were destroyed by the soldiers quartered in said building."

Now what does this bill propose?

Mr. HOUK. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOUK. If you are going to pay this man for this property that was destroyed as you have stated, why is it that your committee fails to report and permits to lie unacted upon bills to pay a half-dozen colleges whose property was used in a similar manner, or used more directly for the benefit of the Government?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Chairman, the inquiry of the gentleman may be pertinent, but it is addressed to the wrong person. I am not a member of that committee.

Mr. HOUK. Excuse me.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I have no interest in this bill except to see that right is done to a deserving and needy man. As I was going on to say when the gentleman asked this question, what does this bill propose? It proposes simply this, not to accept the investigation which has already been made under the direction of the Quartermaster's Department, but to authorize the Quartermaster-General to again investigate this claim and pay what he finds to be due. Now, is there any reason why such an authority should not be vested in the Quartermaster-General's Office? I believe the bill does not go as far as it ought to go. I believe we ought to be willing in this House to accept the findings of the Quartermaster's Department heretofore made. Those findings are already on file in the office of the Quartermaster-General, but this bill is so guarded that we do not ask him to accept them; we authorize him to investigate the claim again and to pay such proportion of the amount claimed as he finds should be paid. As I have said, this man to-day is penniless. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] has spoken of other claims coming from his State and elsewhere. This man also has other claims which he does not ask us to pay, because he knows that under the past policy of Congress he can not expect to be paid. Nevertheless it is a fact that, independent of the property involved in this claim, he has contributed the whole of his fortune for the success of the Union cause. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that there should be no question about the passage of this bill.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUCHANAN. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will you help pay other claims of a similar nature to this?

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will, most assuredly.

A MEMBER. That is "log-rolling."

Mr. BUCHANAN. I do not care whether it is log-rolling or not; if it is honesty toward loyal men, I say yes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. HOUK. That is the contract I have been trying to make

Mr. BUCHANAN. If the gentleman puts it on any "Pan-Electric" basis, I shall have to repudiate it. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, there is a feature of this case which has not been stated either in the report or by any gentleman who has attempted to explain the case.

This gentleman had a contract to build a hotel in the city of Nashville, Tenn., for a man named Overton. When Nashville was taken possession of by the Union forces Mr. Overton went with his friends southward, and continued within the confederate lines until the close of the war. He was a disloyal man; and his property in the city of Memphis and this uncompleted hotel in the city of Nashville were taken possession of by the Union forces and were used from that time until the cessation of hostilities. In this hotel were a large number of doors and window-blinds not yet placed in position—not one of them a kind of property necessary for the use of the army. As a matter of course, this large hotel being used by the Union forces, the doors and window-blinds lying around loose were destroyed. Mr. Millinger thought he had an action against Overton for the destruction of this property, and he commenced a suit in the courts of Tennessee to obtain a mechanic's lien against this building for the amount of property that he had placed in it—these doors and blinds. He was defeated in his action because the property had not been placed in position, and the owner of the building did not get the benefit of it.

Mr. BUCHANAN. And on the other ground that he had not completed the building within the time specified in the contract.

Mr. ROWELL. The first ground was enough. He then filed his claim against the United States for the rental value of the building, claiming that, being in possession, not having delivered the building over to the owner, he was entitled to the rent; and that he, being loyal and being in possession for the purpose of completing the building, the disloyalty of Overton should not prevent him from collecting the rent from the United States, which rent during the time the building was occupied would cover his claim for the destroyed property.

At the same time he owned a mill, with which Overton had nothing to do, and which did belong to a loyal man. That mill was taken possession of and used by the United States forces. In the last Congress I reported a substitute bill, providing for an investigation of the rental value of this mill. If that is the purpose of the bill now before us, I am in favor of it; but if this bill is to go further and admit the doctrine that the Government of the United States is to pay for the destruction of a lot of doors and window-blinds which in the exigencies of war were destroyed by the "boys" of the army who perhaps did not in all cases respect private property as much as they ought to have done, then I am opposed to that portion of the bill. If the bill simply covers an investigation of the rental value of this man's mill, I am in favor it.

Mr. NEGLEY. If the gentleman will allow me, I think I can correct a false impression in his mind. This property was really not destroyed in the sense in which we use the term with reference to other property taken without necessity. Nashville at that time was in a state of siege. The troops were unable to obtain lumber or fire-wood except by cutting down trees within the confines of the city. During this period a portion of these doors, &c., was used to inclose the building, which was at that time occupied as a hospital. A large portion—perhaps the greater portion—of this property was used in that way, and thus destroyed. I say there is no good ground to refuse payment in this case. It is technical and unfair to ask a man, after these many years, to come in here and make proof when he was at the time thousands of miles from that spot which was then within the control of the United States forces.

Mr. HOUK. I concur with the gentleman from Pennsylvania; but if there be good ground in favor of this claim, that good ground should be applied alike to everybody under similar circumstances.

Mr. NEGLEY. I will vote with the gentleman for every act of justice; and I enter my protest here and now against the rejection of honest claims against the Government.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Chairman, I did not read the evidence as it is now stated to be by my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. NEGLEY]. Yet I think I read all the evidence there was in this case during the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. NEGLEY. But the gentleman forgets the fact that I am a living witness to the statement I have made; and I certainly have made no statement before.

Mr. ROWELL. Certainly I accept the statement of the gentleman as a "living witness." But in the consideration of a case before the War Claims Committee the testimony of living witnesses ought to be reduced to writing and put on file so that we might consider it.

Mr. NEGLEY. But I was not a claim agent. I had nothing whatever to do with this case; had no knowledge it was pending, and I was not here to make any statement.

Mr. ROWELL. Witnesses are not claim agents.

Mr. NEGLEY. A good many of them are. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROWELL. I undertake to say that no quartermaster ever seized doors and windows to be burned as fuel in a place like Nashville, situated as it was at the time this building was taken possession of and when this property disappeared. Nashville was not in a state of siege when this building was first occupied, nor for a long time thereafter.

Mr. NEGLEY. Why, the gentleman has certainly not followed the course of events there. From the very moment when General Buell withdrew from Nashville the city was substantially in a state of siege, and there was not a pound of forage or grain or food obtained except by armed forces.

Mr. ROWELL. Oh, if the presence of a few guerrillas or raiding cavalry forces made Nashville in a state of seige, then every point occupied in the State of Tennessee during all the war was in a state of siege. There was not any trouble in getting wood at Nashville, as we know by the wood contracts which have turned up in Congress time after time, there being at least two during this Congress.

The point I desire to make is this: Congress cannot enter upon the business of paying for depredations. I undertake to say that the injury to the Overton building and the destruction of the finished material about to be put into place can not be classed in any other way than as depredations. I am willing and anxious to vote to pay for every honest claim, but I am opposed to opening the door and entering upon this other line of claims. They exist everywhere.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. ROWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Did we not the other day pass a bill providing for the payment of a claim in Kentucky for thirty-odd cords of wood, and did not the committee raise the price from $3, as originally charged, to $6, as allowed in the bill and report, and was not the reason for that expressly stated by one of the gentlemen from Kentucky to be because they included in it fence-rails, and were not those depredations?

Mr. ROWELL. It has been my experience that dry fence-rails make good fuel.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But they can not beat a good pine door.

Mr. ROWELL. It was my experience when I passed across the river below Vicksburg that by order of the commanding general of the Army all the fence-rails were taken down and cut up into cord-wood to be used on the steamboats. While it is true a pine door makes pretty good fuel, it would be very expensive. I recollect that we passed a bill in the last Congress to pay for cutting up the planking on a pier running out into one of the bays of the Pacific Ocean, but we reduced all that planking to cord-wood and allowed only for the value of that cord-wood. Now, if you will take the pine boards that went into the doors and the pine boards that went into the window-blinds and reduce them to cord-wood and prove that cord-wood was seized by proper authority or under proper circumstances, I would be willing to pay for it; but I am not willing to pay for diamonds when we only need anthracite coal. I am not willing because the Government took lawful possession of a hotel, owned by a man who would not remain in the Union lines, to pay under color of loyalty for injury done to that building.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But this property never did belong to that man.

Mr. ROWELL. Mr. Overton?

Mr. BUCHANAN. It had never passed into his possession.

Mr. ROWELL. There are a great many pieces of property out of his possession which may belong to a man. The courts of Tennessee decided he was entitled to the property; that Overton owned the property and was entitled to it, and that Millinger was not entitled to receive pay for his blinds and doors.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Does not the gentleman understand that when he is erecting a building under contract, a building to be delivered at a future time, the material not yet placed in position remains his? That is a fundamental principle.

Mr. ROWELL. That depends on the statute law of the State; but the possession of the building under the laws of Tennessee did not remain in him, and he had not any right to run the building under the claim he made.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Did not remain in whom?

Mr. ROWELL. In the man who was erecting the building.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Millinger?

Mr. ROWELL. He was the contractor and did not have possession of the building he was erecting.

Mr. BUCHANAN. He had possession of it for the purpose of completing his contract.

Mr. HOWELL. He was a loyal Pennsylvanian inside the rebel lines, and going ahead with work for disloyal men during the continuance of the war.

Mr. BUCHANAN. But in a State that was not declared to be in a state of insurrection.

Mr. ROWELL. But in a State declared to be in a state of insurrection.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROWELL] has said he would not oppose an honest claim. I have looked into this matter; this gentleman, Mr. Millinger, being a Pennsylvanian, who in good faith took, with the other members of his firm, a contract to build the Overton Hotel. I believe that fact is undisputed. About 1862 Mr. Overton thought it worth while to go beyond the Union lines and join the army of the enemy. I do not know whether or not he was fleeing for his life, but still he went South; there is no disputing that fact, and he staid away until 1865, getting back some time in the spring of that year, and sought pardon from this most beneficent Government, and he got it. He then set up some claim for the rent of that building, and I say this in reply to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], that he made this claim for a few months' rent and it ended in the proper department of the Government paying him the rent. I do not know how much was allowed, but it was occupied in that way for some three or four months at a rental value of $3,000, or about that.

Now, Mr. Millinger was the party who suffered. He complied with his contract as far as he was able to comply with it, and hence he had the right to have the benefit of the work that he had done and the material that he had purchased. He could not get that in the courts of Tennessee, because they decided that the building was not finished and had not been delivered to Overton under the contract. His only resource then is to come here and ask Congress to award to him so much money for the loss he has sustained. It is a very simple case. The Committee on War Claims, it should be remembered, do not absolutely ask to have the twenty or twenty-two thousand dollars appropriated to pay the claim; but the bill provides in its last few lines that it must go to the War Department, which Department must examine into the character of the claim and the facts upon which it is based, and it must go through that Department satisfactorily before they can get $1 of the $22,000 that the committee recommends shall be paid if the claim is allowed or is favorably recommended by the Department. Mr. Millinger can not get a dollar unless the vouchers which are examined by the Department of the Government are declared to be right and proper.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to claim that one cent of the $22,000 provided for in this bill is for rent or occupation of the Overton building during the war?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; not for rent.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. And is it not a fact that by the express provisions of the bill, under the report of the Committee on War Claims, the entire amount is allowed for the articles that were destroyed by the United States troops while they occupied it?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; that is what I have said.

Now, sir, and answering the gentleman's question in the affirmative, this claim is for the material that was in that building which belonged to Mr. Millinger when the United States troops took possession of it and destroyed this material. They occupied it for three years or more, from 1862 to 1865, and these articles were taken. I do not mean to say they were all destroyed, but were used for some purpose or other, and Mr. Millinger could never get compensation for his material which was in the building. He could have gone on and completed this contract if he had been permitted to do so. He was ready to continue his work and complete the building; and here the matter stares us in the face that this material, valued at $22,000, was taken possession of in some form or other, and the owner of it comes now and asks Congress to give him that amount of money for his material. That is all there is of it.

And yet this bill, as I have said before, does not give it absolutely, but remands the question to the War Department; so that under any circumstances we are not in danger of paying anything to Mr. Millinger, or acknowledging any claim of his that is not susceptible of proof which must be satisfactory to the proper authorities.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. May I ask another question?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I wish to ask if by the terms of this bill Congress does not pledge itself to the doctrine that it will pay for property destroyed belonging to a Union citizen?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. And does it not provide when the amount is ascertained that that is all that is to be done and makes the appropriation for the payment of it through the Secretary of War, without having to come back to Congress again?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; I will read a few lines of the bill which answers that question fully.

> And the sum of $22,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to enable the Secretary of War to adjust and the accounting officers of the Treasury to pay said Millinger the amount of his said losses, as allowed and approved under authority of this act.

He does not come back to Congress, but must submit to an investigation on the part of the War Department.

Mr. PERKINS. For what purpose?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. To ascertain how much of this $22,000 is due him.

Mr. PERKINS. And not to ascertain the circumstances under which it was taken—whether there was a contract, whether the Government is liable or not?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. No, sir; the War Department must investigate the matter and act upon the claim. But the fact is that another report was made at the instigation of Secretary Stanton through the Quartermaster-General's Department, and it was shown that it was a contract that Millinger had entered into, a contract to construct the building; and that when the United States troops occupied the building—and my colleague [Mr. NEGLEY] has shown that they not only occupied it, but that many doors and sash and other material was destroyed and converted to hospital purposes—this property was taken, which forms the basis of this claim.

Mr. GOFF. Will the gentleman allow me a question? What is the date of the contract under which this work was begun?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Something prior to 1862. I am not exactly clear as to the date.

Mr. BUCHANAN. In April, 1860.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. And it is shown that Mr. Millinger had secured all of this material to the value of some $22,000 which was taken away by United States troops and destroyed or converted to hospital uses after occupying the building for some three years, or until the fall of 1865.

Mr. NEGLEY. And he lost all his profits in the building?

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; every dollar was lost to this man. Why, sir, I have no doubt he would have been very glad to have received compensation as rental. It would have amounted to $30,000 or $35,000, based on what was paid to the man Overton after he served through the war and had been pardoned by the Government.

I look upon this as a just claim. I say we have good precedents for it. We have paid such claims reported from the War Claims Committee. I do not know whether in this Congress or not—one was referred to by my friend from New Jersey [Mr. BUCHANAN]—but we have paid such claims, and I have always thought there was no committee in this House more careful in looking into a case than the Committee on War Claims.

I do not mean to say every claim can be paid or that every claim can be indorsed by Congress when it is examined. But when we have a claim which has been examined by a competent committee of this House and it is reported favorably to this House and referred to this Committee of the Whole, I say, Mr. Chairman, we should take this report as embracing the true facts of the case and should be guided by it to a great extent. Hence I say in justice to this man Millinger, whose capital was put into the finishing of this building, we should allow the bill to pass, so that the Secretary of War and the proper officials can ascertain what is due to him and pay him.

Mr. PERRY. I believe I am entitled to the floor as having reported the pending bill, and I desire to say a word or two of explanation to do away with the impression that seems to have been created by the words of the report. This claim was originally presented for the use and the occupation of a saw-mill, for the use and occupation of the building, and for the destruction of the property in the building. Altogether I suppose it would have amounted to $60,000 or $70,000. Upon one of these points, as to the value of the property destroyed in the building, the Quartermaster-General's Department sent an officer to ascertain the amount of the property destroyed, and the report of that officer is embodied in the report of the committee. But that is not the essence of the claim.

This bill covers the claim for use and occupation of the building or the rent of it as much as it does for the destruction of the property left in the building. And besides that, this amount covers the amount claimed for the use of the saw-mill for one hundred and fifty-eight days, which, according to a great deal of the testimony in the case, was worth $50 a day. As to the use and occupation of the saw-mill, which is not denied, the claim was investigated by the War Department and it was decided to be a just claim; but before it could be paid the act of 1867 was passed, which prevented the payment for the use and occupation of property in disloyal States. That is all that prevented this man from receiving his pay for the use and occupation of the saw-mill at the time the claim was examined by the Quartermaster-General's Department.

So far then as the claim for the use and occupation of the mill is concerned it has been passed upon by the proper officers and has been allowed, and was only prevented from being paid by the passage of the act of 1867.

The other two branches of the claim are for the use and occupation of the hotel and for the destruction of the property contained in the building. The language of the bill is not that he shall be paid for the property destroyed; it is—

> And also the loss the said Millinger sustained on account of the military occupation of the Overton House in said city during said years.

So, whether you say this amount of $22,000 shall cover the destruction of the property, or the use of the hotel building, or the use of the saw-mill, in any event the amount is utterly inadequate to compensate the man for the use of the saw-mill, which was worth seven or eight thousand dollars, the rent of the building, which was worth $10,000 a year, and for the property, which, on the report of the Quartermaster-General's Department, was worth $19,000.

I think, therefore, the House is under a wrong impression as to this being a bill to pay for property destroyed in the building. It is really to pay for the use and occupation of the building by the United States troops and United States authorities during the war. So far as that is concerned I am not familiar with the record of this House as to war claims, but I believe that such claims have been passed heretofore, and if any have been this ought to be.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PERRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Can an instance be given of a claim like this being allowed by the House?

Mr. PERRY. I am not familiar, as I have said, with what has been the action of the House with reference to such claims. This is the first time I have been on the Committee on War Claims, and this is the first report I have made. I am not familiar with the record of the House in these matters, but I think we recommended the other day the payment of a claim for ice.

A MEMBER. That was under a contract.

Mr. PERRY. There was a claim for it which we allowed.

Mr. REED, of Maine. This is a very wide territory we are opening. The armies of the United States, in territory which was reconquered, certainly inflicted a great deal of damage. If we are to pay for it, with the other expenses of the war, certainly any future war will become impossible.

Mr. PERRY. The Government did pay Overton, after he came back and took the oath of allegiance in 1865, $3,500 rent for this building.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Under what circumstances?

Mr. PERRY. They had occupied the building after they paid Overton.

Mr. PERKINS. Under contract?

Mr. PERRY. No, sir; no contract. The occupation, as I understand it, was continuous from 1862, when it was occupied as Millinger's property. It was occupied up to the end of 1865, and Overton got the rent for 1865.

Mr. ROWELL. You do not mean that Overton got any rent until after he took the oath?

Mr. PERRY. No, sir; but if he was entitled to the rent after he took the oath, I do not see why Millinger, who was a loyal man all the time, was not entitled to be paid.

Mr. BUCHANAN. That is just the point in the case.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, the question is whether this does not come within the class of claims which have been uniformly rejected by this House and by Congress. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. PERRY] states that this was not for property destroyed but for occupation of the premises. If that be so, the report is certainly unfortunately drawn. The report says that investigation shows that at the time the military took possession of the building Millinger, or his firm, had in the building 540 doors and trimmings worth $5,654.75; 670 windows and trimmings worth $12,573; base-boards and grounds worth $1,668; making a total value of $19,895.75. "All these articles were destroyed by the soldiers quartered in said building. Undoubtedly Mr. Millinger's claim for $19,895.75 is just and right, and $22,000 would not replace the articles destroyed."

That is the basis of the claim.

Now, if the Government had taken this property, these doors and windows and trimmings, to be used in the construction of a building for the use of the Army, then the property would have been taken for ordinary quartermaster's stores. But, according to the statement in the report, these building materials were found in a hotel, which was occupied by a portion of the United States troops as barracks, and were destroyed. They may have been burned up, used for fire-wood, as in many cases such kinds of property were during the war. But this claim describes that kind of destruction of property which Congress can not afford to pay for, and certainly we ought not to make this case a precedent. The Committee on War Claims, as I understand it, has made a rule that all claims of this class shall be reported adversely. If so, this bill is inadvertently before the House, and was, perhaps, reported without investigation upon this point.

The only cases in which these war claims have been sustained or can be properly sustained is that the property was taken and used as quartermaster's supplies for the use of the Army in the field, and Congress has uniformly refused to pay any cases of the mere destruction of property incident to the military occupation. I hope, therefore, that this bill will not pass, for if it does it will open up a vast, unlimited, and illimitable field of claims which, if they were all to be paid, would bankrupt this country, and the payment of which is not demanded by any principle of justice or by any rule which prevails in cases arising in time of war.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] if this bill does not by its provisions go even much further than he has suggested—if it does not contemplate that this man shall be compensated for all the damages he sustained in consequence of the Federal occupation of this building?

Mr. SPRINGER. The bill does go further than I have stated.

Mr. PERKINS. It has been argued here that this man lost all the money that he had invested in this building in consequence of its occupation by the troops, and this bill now proposes to pay him in full for that loss.

Mr. NEGLEY. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. PERRY. The amount is limited.

Mr. PERKINS. But why impose upon the Government officers the labor of making the investigation if we are going to pay this man for all the loss sustained up to the limit of $22,000? The report says he has sustained a loss much in excess of this claim, and if we are going to pay this claim at all why not pay it in full?

Mr. PERRY. On the principle, I suppose, that "half a loaf is better than no bread."

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Chairman, the report, as I have shown, enumerates articles said to have been destroyed to the amount of over $19,000, and proposes an appropriation of $22,000. The difference between the $19,000 and the $22,000 is intended, I suppose, to pay for the loss covered by this language: "and also the loss said Millinger sustained on account of the occupation of the said Overton House in said city during said year." That is, of course, objectionable. This comes within the class of cases which have been uniformly rejected, and I trust the bill will not pass.

Mr. PERRY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] this question: Do you think this claimant would be entitled to the rent of his saw-mill which was used by the Government for one hundred and fifty-eight days?

Mr. SPRINGER. That claim does not appear here.

Mr. PERRY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. It does appear from the report that he received rent for the building after he returned.

Mr. PERRY. No, sir; it was Overton who received the rent.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, Overton and this claimant both claimed rent for the same property. There is only one piece of property in question. I read from the report:

> It is alleged that on the return of Overton from the rebellion in February, 1865, he took the oath of allegiance, and received from the Government rent for the use of said hotel after that time.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] yield for a motion to recommit this bill to the Committee on War Claims?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move that this committee recommend that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a motion now pending that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The Chair understands the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] to offer his motion as a substitute for that.

Mr. SPRINGER. The pending motion can be amended by striking out the recommendation that the bill pass and inserting a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. HOUK. Mr. Chairman, is an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from Indiana in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is.

Mr. HOUK. Then I move as an amendment that this bill be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims with instructions to bring in a bill of a general character to cover all this class of cases.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPRINGER. That motion is not in order now.

Mr. BUCHANAN. If the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUK] is entertained, I raise the point of order that the proposed instructions are out of order—that such general bill should emanate from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HOUK. I suppose the question of order is debatable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee will please reduce his amendment to writing, so that the Chair may see just what it is, as a point of order is raised upon it.

Mr. SPRINGER. The amendment simply proposes that this private bill be recommitted with instructions that a general law be reported, which would not be in order.

Mr. PERKINS. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee is in effect to convert a private bill into a general bill. I make that point of order.

Mr. HOUK. I think it probable that is a good point. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order as stated by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS].

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me some motion should be made which would indicate the views of the Committee of the Whole in regard to this class of claims, which are becoming very numerous. Up to this time no claim of this character, so far as I am aware, has passed Congress. Here is a claim for damages only, committed by the Army in the progress of the war; and the question is whether this House is prepared to enter upon the policy of paying claims of this class. All our legislation up to this time, both during the war and since, is against such a policy. There is not an enactment touching claims against the Government growing out of the war that does not expressly prohibit the payment of this class of claims. Inasmuch as the bill now before the House proposes in a very tangible form to make a direct appropriation of money to pay a claim of this character, it seems to me my friend from Ohio [Mr. GEDDES], the chairman of the War Claims Committee, and other gentlemen on that committee, would desire to have a direct instruction as to whether Congress, so far as the action of this House is concerned, proposes to pay this class of claims.

Mr. GEDDES. I trust the gentleman will permit a remark in response to his suggestion.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GEDDES. I have no doubt the Committee on War Claims would be gratified to receive at any time instructions from this House as to the course to be pursued by the committee; but, in reference to the apprehension the gentleman has expressed, I will assure him that he need give himself no uneasiness in regard to the action of that committee. We have reported numerous cases since this bill was reported, indicating the policy of the committee. So that, on this particular point he need not be apprehensive; and I feel that the committee will need no instructions, although they will certainly not interpose any objection to instructions.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I understand, then, from the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, that the attitude of the commitee is against this class of claims.

Mr. GEDDES. I am not prepared to say that, because I think this claim has in part been misapprehended. It was not investigated in the committee, because we had not the evidence or exhibits upon which the committee could act. It was for the purpose of obtaining such evidence as would be required for a satisfactory investigation that this report was framed and this reference of the case proposed. Our discussion here at present is, as it would be in committee, without a sufficient basis upon which to proceed.

There may be some matters in this claim that ought to be considered and are entitled to consideration; therefore I am not prepared to answer in the broad terms of the gentleman's question and say that this claim is groundless and ought not to be allowed, for it will be observed that this man had a saw-mill in the vicinity of Nashville; the Government forces took possession of that saw-mill; he was there prior to the war; he was a loyal man; he was engaged under a contract to make certain improvements and to erect certain buildings in Nashville, and was engaged with a large force at his mill and elsewhere in furnishing material for those buildings. The United States forces took possession of his mill, took possession of his lumber, took entire control of his business. Hence there may be much in the case that would be the foundation of a good claim to compensation for what might be regarded as really and strictly quartermaster stores.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that none of those matters are involved either in the bill or in the report. Indeed the report excludes all such matters from consideration.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield for a suggestion?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCHANAN. A good deal of time has already been consumed on this floor upon this bill. I did not introduce the bill; I did not report it. I have taken an interest in it simply because the claimant is at present a resident of my State, living near my own home. Having advocated the bill on this floor, I will say that if a simple motion to lay the bill aside with a recommendation that it be recommitted can prevail, I, as a friend of the bill, shall support that motion.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection whatever——

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will my colleague [Mr. HOLMAN] allow me to make a suggestion as a member of the Committee on War Claims?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I have made this motion to recommit because this discussion has developed facts in this case of which before I had no knowledge; and there may be some things embraced in this bill which would not be sanctioned by the committee if their attention were called to them. I have made the motion to recommit in order that the Committee on War Claims may have an opportunity to do justice to themselves by a reinvestigation of the case.

Mr. HOLMAN. I have no objection to that course being pursued; and it is perhaps due to the Committee on War Claims that such a course be adopted, for the report accompanying this bill would appear upon its face to have been the result of a misapprehension. If these two papers taken together—the bill and the report—should go to the Quartermaster's Department they would be simply an instruction to inquire into the amount of property which, as appears upon the face of the report, was not appropriated to the use of the Government, but destroyed in the ordinary casualties of war. Believing from what has been said that there is a misapprehension as to the real state of the case, and that unintentionally the report itself does not take into account the particular phraseology of the bill, I think myself that as a matter of entire fairness the bill should be recommitted.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I wish in justice to myself to say that I did not read this bill until after this debate began. I was familiar with the facts of the case and had read the report. While not abating one jot of my conviction that this claim is just and should be paid; while I believe that upon fuller investigation the War Claims Committee will arrive at the conclusion that it shall be paid, I do not hesitate to say that there is in the bill some language which is unfortunate in form.

The amendment of Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana, was agreed to.

The question being taken on the motion as amended that the bill be reported to the House with a recommendation that it be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims, the motion was agreed to.

JOHN M'NAUGHTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1877) for the relief of John McNaughton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John McNaughton, of Gervais, Scioto County, Ohio, the pay and allowances due said John McNaughton for services rendered the United States as second lieutenant of Company G, First Regiment of West Virginia Cavalry Volunteers, from the 16th day of August, A. D. 1863, to the 5th day of February, A. D. 1864.

Mr. THOMPSON. I ask that the report of the committee be read.

The report of the committee (by Mr. HIESTAND) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1877) for the relief of John McNaughton, submit the following report:

John McNaughton, now of Gervais, Scioto County, Ohio, was enrolled as a private, Company G, First Virginia Cavalry Volunteers, on the 14th day of August, A. D. 1861, and was discharged, as first sergeant of said company, on the 15th day of August, A. D. 1863, for promotion to second lieutenant of said company. He was commissioned as second lieutenant of said company on the 12th day of August, A. D. 1863, by the governor of West Virginia, and was assigned to duty, and served as such until the 5th day of February, A. D. 1864. As soon as his duties in the field permitted, he applied to the proper officer for muster, but his application was refused on the ground that his company did not have the requsite number of men, under General Orders No. 182, Adjutant-General's Office, series of 1863, to entitle it to a second lieutenant. Notwithstanding he had been mustered out as an enlisted man, and had been refused muster as lieutenant, yet he was held to service without pay, rations, or clothing until February 5, 1864, and during all that time performed service as second lieutenant. Since then he made application to the proper department for pay, but his claim was rejected because there was no law governing the case.

In view of these facts, the committee recommend the passage of this bill for his relief.

Mr. THOMPSON. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was accordingly laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WILLIAM CLIFT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4413) for the relief of William Clift.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to William Clift, of Hamilton County, Tennessee, the sum of $3,000, for wood taken and used by the Army of the United States during the late war.

The report (by Mr. HIESTAND) was read, as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Clift, submit the following report thereon:

"The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House Report of the Committee on War Claims No. 245, first session of the Forty-eighth Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended.

"The committee adopt the said report as their own, and report herewith a bill appropriating the sum of $3,000, and recommend its passage.

"The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Clift, of Hamilton County, Tennessee, asking for compensation for timber and wood, stated at $19,645, makes the following report:

"The facts in the case are as follows: In 1863 the claimant and one William Stringer were the owners in common of certain lands lying on the north side of the Tennessee River, in Hamilton County, Tennessee, containing about 5,000 acres. It was covered with timber, principally oak, when, in the fall of 1863, the United States Army advanced and took possession of this section of the country. From that time until the close of the war details were almost constantly employed on the land cutting the timber and hauling it away for the several uses of the Army. The Government erected a saw-mill near this land, and a great deal of the timber was sawed on that mill. The timber was used in the construction of bridges, storehouses, and other army buildings. The greater part, however, was taken for fuel for the use of the Army. Some tracts were entirely cut off, some culled, and some untouched.

"The claim was investigated by Lieut. Col. J. A. Ekin, chief of quartermaster's department of the South, through his agents, Dougherty and Woodburn, who took a large amount of testimony and made a very full report. Army officers, as well as private citizens, testified to the intense loyalty of the claimant. He suffered greatly in his person and property on account of his devotion to the cause of the Union. There is no doubt but the timber was taken by the United States Army and used by it. United States officers testify to this. The value of the timber was the only thing in dispute.

"These agents, after much time spent in investigating this claim, recommended paying claimant for 12,030 cords of wood, at 75 cents per cord, amounting to $9,022.50. Colonel Ekin, in making his return of the claim in November, 1875, also recommended the payment of the same amount. In August, 1876, the Quartermaster-General gave direction to report this and six other cases, mainly for timber taken from lands in the vicinity of Chattanooga, Tenn., on the basis of the settlement made in the Abner C. Carroll cases referred to the Treasurer March 6, 1871. In that case the timber was considered as constituting one-half of the value of the land. On that basis claimant's demand was reduced to $3,435.23.

"The Quartermaster-General's Department was not satisfied with this. Joseph Livsey was appointed agent by the Quartermaster's Department, and in October, 1876, he commenced taking depositions to show the value from the assessment of lands in that county, and by showing its value before and after the war.

"The witnesses differed greatly in value, some swearing the assessment was no criterion of value, that lands were assessed sometimes at only one-half, and sometimes one-fourth their actual value; that this tract was only valuable for its timber, the land being what is termed "ridge land."

"On looking over all the testimony in the case, the committee believe that the claimant should be allowed the sum of $3,000, which is $435.23 less than any of the Government agents found. The only reason given by the War Department for its rejection was that the claimant made his demand so high ($19,545) that it was fraudulent on its face. This might be a good rule to follow in some cases in order to discourage the presentment of dishonest claims, as, for instance, where a man claimed for four horses taken and used by the Government when he had only two. He must have known his claim was fraudulent.

"But the claim in this case rested purely on the opinion of witnesses, and widely different results would be attained according to the basis upon which the estimate was made. When the number of cords was the basis (and who will say that was fraudulent?) a much larger result was reached. When the assessment was taken as a basis and a comparison with other tracts similarly located, a smaller amount was found to be due, and when we consider that these statements are usually prepared by lawyers or claim agents who always insert the largest amounts, knowing always that they can recover less than they claim but can never recover more, the claimant should not in this case be regarded as presenting a fraudulent claim.

"He is now about eighty-five years of age, has suffered much for his country, and the sum now allowed ($3,000) ought to be paid, and the committee report favorably that sum, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill."

Mr. HIESTAND. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, the report discloses the fact that this claim was investigated by the Quartermaster-General's Department and a certain sum found to be due.

A MEMBER. Found by the agent of the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But it does not disclose why, if this sum was found to be due, it was not paid through the Quartermaster-General's Department.

Mr. STORM. I think the gentleman will find that the report does disclose that fact.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is not disclosed, so far as I heard the reading of the report, by the report itself.

Mr. STORM. If the gentleman had watched the reading of the report closely he would have seen that the rejection was based upon the fact that this claimant laid a claim for a larger amount of cord-wood than was afterward proved to have been taken, and therefore the whole claim was rejected as fraudulent. That was the ground upon which the Quartermaster-General's Department rejected it.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, the facts are not exactly as they have been stated by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STORM], who drew the report of the Committee on War Claims in the last Congress, and whose report has been used by the Committee on War Claims at the present session. The fact is there were not exactly 19,000 cords of wood used, but the mistake arose, or rather the case presented here was that the agent of the Quartermaster-General thought this claimant was charging too much for the 19,000 cords of wood. It was not that they did not take the wood, and not that it was not used for the Army, but that the agent thought that he had charged too much for the wood, and therefore the price was cut down.

Mr. STORM. Was I not correct in stating that the claim was for more than the Government thought was due, and therefore the whole claim was rejected as fraudulent?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes; and for that reason, as it was fraudulent on its face, no part of the claim should be allowed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will state that this is not a case in which a man comes and presents his claim for 4 cords of wood when he only lost 2—it is not a case where a man comes and presents his claim for 19,000 cords of wood when he had not lost any wood at all; but it appears the Quartermaster-General concluded that the claimant had charged too high a price for his wood, and therefore decided the whole claim was fraudulent. As a matter of fact, the amount of wood taken was about 19,000 cords, and the claimant produced witnesses who proved that the wood was worth the amount he swore it was worth when he presented his claim. The Quartermaster-General, not being satisfied, sent his agents out to ascertain as to the amount due. They went out and reported 19,000 cords as the amount taken, but he was not satisfied with that report. He sent his agents out again and directed them to estimate the value of the wood taken upon the basis of what is called the Abner C. Carroll case. In that case, to get at the value of the wood, they take the value of the land with the wood upon it, and estimate the wood as worth half that amount, and the land only as the other half. Therefore they said, after the wood was taken, they would settle at half the amount the land was worth with the wood upon it. That would bring the claim down to $3,450 in round numbers. But the committee at the last session said we will reduce it $400 more, and simply allow him $3,000.

This committee come along and adopt that report, as I stated, and say that this claimant should have this small sum of about $3,000, to which the claim has been reduced.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say briefly that this old man was about sixty-eight years of age when the war broke out. He was loyal to the Union, and went to work and raised a regiment for service in the Union Army. He was captured and carried to Atlanta, Ga., by the confederate troops. Subsequently he made his escape and came back to East Tennessee, but was compelled to lie out in the mountains in that inhospitable country at that time, whereby he lost not his life but the sight of one of his eyes, and his physical strength was greatly impaired. He suffered a great deal. Notwithstanding his loyalty and the loss that he endured, this committee have reduced the amount that is properly due him, in my judgment, to less than one-half, and I hope this committee will not hesitate now to allow this old man this poor pittance of his claim.

Mr. Chairman, he tried to live long enough to get the benefit of this claim. I regret to say that only last week he died at the advanced age of eighty-nine. He could not live long enough to reap the benefit of that to which he was entitled from his country which he had served so well, he having been a colonel at the advanced age of seventy.

Mr. STORM (from his seat). Congress beat him.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, as my friend from Pennsylvania suggests, Congress beat him; he could not live long enough to get his rights. Now, I have an amendment which I desire to offer, and which is rendered necessary by the long delay in the passage of this bill. This amendment I am directed by the committee to submit.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out in the fifth line the words "William Clift" and insert "the legal representatives of William Clift, deceased."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with favorable recommendation.

Mr. SPRINGER. Before that is done, Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word.

I understood the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] at a former sitting of this committee to state that it had not been the policy of Congress to pay any claims that had been rejected by the Quartermaster's Department; and that it was the settled policy of Congress that the decision of the Quartermaster, under the law of July 4, 1864, was to be regarded as final in these cases. Now, it seems to me that if that department of the Government, authorized by a special law to investigate cases and report upon them to Congress for its action, has rejected a case and that claim thereafter comes into Congress and you are asked to pay it, we are simply constituting Congress a high court of appeals from the Quartermaster's Department of the Government.

Mr. STORM. What else is it?

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, I am opposed to constituting Congress a court of appeals from that tribunal or any other of the Government. I would like to have a finality at some place in the affairs of this Government where a claim would be regarded as having been finally quieted.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Who constituted the Quartermaster-General an infallible tribunal to pass upon these claims, a tribunal whose decisions should be beyond appeal?

Mr. SPRINGER. Congress did.

Mr. STONE, of Kentucky. Then I would like to ask, if Congress did that, if Congress has not the right to declare that that infallibility has ceased? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Oh, yes. We have assumed the right to do almost anything. What I am now objecting to in regard to this bill is that it is setting a precedent for reviewing the decisions of the Quartermaster's Department (which Congress has created as a tribunal for the consideration of these claims) after they have been rejected.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Chairman, a single word in response to the gentleman from Illinois as to Congress passing upon these questions. If the Quartermaster's Department was constituted a court and had rendered a final judgment upon a claim, we might not review that decision unless it was clearly shown that the court, for reasons not satisfactory to us as a reviewing tribunal, had not properly considered the matter.

Now, the Quartermaster-General went forward and gave his reasons for disallowing this claim, and when his reasons are investigated you see at once they are not good. The only reason he gave in the world was that the claim was fraudulent on its face.

Mr. SPRINGER. Well, was not that a good reason?

Mr. RICHARDSON. No, sir; not in this case; for the proof showed that the amount of wood absolutely lost was double the amount you are offering to pay him for. It can not be a fraudulent claim on its face, for the reason set forth in the admirable report of a former member of the War Claims Committee which has been read here to-day.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Tennessee permit me to make a suggestion?

Mr. RICHARDSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that it is too late for this Congress now to say that it will not review a decision of a lower court. We spent a whole week reviewing, with a view to set aside, the judgment of a military court rendered twenty years ago; and can not we now set aside a decision one man made refusing to pay a man for his wood that was taken while he was in the Federal Army or sent from his home by confederate troops?

Mr. HAMMOND, of Georgia. Now, what have you got to say? [Laughter.]

Mr. SPRINGER. My friend from Georgia says, now what have I got to say. Well, to some that would be satisfactory, so far as this side of the House is concerned; but how is it with the gentleman's friends upon the other side? What have you to say about setting aside these decisions?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. We voted, sir, to pay a loyal man, who served his country faithfully, for what was taken by the Government, while you voted to reward a man who failed to do his duty to his Government; and that is the difference between us.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is not the question at issue. The gentlemen over there voted they could not set aside the finding of that tribunal. They stated in their arguments there was no power in the Constitution to do so.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I submit the gentleman has no right to inquire into the reasons which prompted gentlemen on the other side to vote as they did.

Mr. SPRINGER. I am commending the argument to gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber to whom it applies.

Mr. HOUK. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. SPRINGER. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOUK. I wish to reply to one remark made some time ago by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER]. He started out by saying it had been the policy of Congress not to pass a claim in any case where the Quartermaster-General had rejected it. Now, Mr. Chairman, we have paid claims in every Congress I have been in, and I suppose in every Congress since the war, which Quartermasters-General had rejected. And it seems to me that the Quartermaster-General having with reference to these matters limited powers scarcely amounting to judicial functions, it is peculiarly the prerogative of Congress, when they find a case like this where absolute injustice has been done, to do justice. This is not like the decision of a court-martial or any other judicial power, for the Quartermaster-General is only a clerk of the Secretary of War.

Mr. SPRINGER. I regret Congress did not provide in the act of 4th July, 1864, for appeals to the Court of Claims. But no appeal was provided for. It was understood the decisions of the Quartermaster's Department were to be final. And if every claimant who is not satisfied with the judgment of the Quartermaster-General on his case is to come to Congress, I ask when Congress will get the opportunity of transacting any public business?

Mr. HOUK. I can answer the gentleman, if he will permit me.

Mr. SPRINGER. I can answer the question myself; it is so easy a question. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUK. The gentleman ought not to ask the question if he does not want an answer. My answer is that Congress will be relieved of all these cases whenever we go to work and provide a tribunal vested with judicial power and make it what the gentleman assumes the Quartermaster's Department to be, a court whose jurisdiction shall be final and conclusive.

Mr. SPRINGER. That does not answer my question. The act of 4th of July, 1864, did constitute the Quartermaster-General a court.

Mr. HOUK. The gentleman does not understand my answer.

Mr. SPRINGER. It did authorize the Quartermaster-General to pass finally on these cases, and that was not in the interest of the Government as against the claimant, but in the interest of the claimant as against the Government; because the claims were small in amounts. We passed a bill a short time ago including hundreds of these claims, some of them as low as $15. It was supposed by those who occupied these seats before us, when that act was passed, that great hardship would result from sending these claims to the Court of Claims, where the cost would be great, and to accommodate that class of claimants the cases were sent to the Quartermaster-General's Department for adjudication. And when the Quartermaster-General had passed upon them as a matter of protection to the Government, they regarded the decisions as final.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PRYOR N. LEA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 79) for the relief of Pryor N. Lea; reported from the Committee on War Claims.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to cause to be paid to Pryor N. Lea the sum of $1,919, in full discharge of his claim against the Government of the United States for rescuing three United States soldiers from a sand-bar in the Mississippi River on the 1st day of January, 1864, and for board, medical aid, and nursing given them while unable to return to their command, and also for board furnished other United States soldiers while guarding said sick.

The report (by Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana) is as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 79) for the relief of Pryor N. Lea, report as follows:

The facts out of which this claim for relief arises will be found stated in House

Report of the Committee on War Claims No. 2423, second session of the Forty-eighth Congress, a copy of which is hereto appended.

Your committee adopt the said report as their own, and report back the bill and recommend its passage.

"The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5701) for the relief of Pryor N. Lea, report as follows:

"This bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay claimant $1,919 for rescuing three United States soldiers from a sand-bar in the Mississippi River on January 1, 1864, and for board, medical attention, and nursing, and also for board furnished twenty-five United States soldiers while guarding them.

"The facts in the case are as stated in the following extract from the memorial of the claimant:

"'On the last day of December, 1863, Col. E. H. Wolf, commanding at Fort Pillow, sent Lieutenant Alexander, of the Fifty-second Indiana Volunteer Infantry, in command of a squad of men up the river, about 20 miles above the fort, to look after some smuggled goods that had been reported to them. They were in a yawl on their return after dark; they were blown upon a sand-bar in the river opposite to my house. The sand-bar is some 5 or 6 miles long, and they were blown upon the lower end, about 2 miles below my house. It was snowing and blowing, and a terrible storm was raging. Eight of the men, including the lieutenant, waded out on the bar, and the others attempted to row the boat around to them in deeper water, but were driven down the river by the wind and driven ashore on the Arkansas side; all of which I learned from them. The bar was perfectly barren and there was nothing to protect them from the storm. On the morning of the 1st of January, 1864, I heard voices calling, and seemingly in distress, and ran down to the river. I was informed by George Clark, one of the soldiers, that Lieutenant Alexander and four of the men had frozen to death, and that they, the others, were almost frozen. They begged and implored me to rescue them. The channel between the bar and the shore was between one-fourth and one-half of a mile wide. The river was filled with floating ice, and the wind was blowing a perfect gale. My skiff was about half-full of ice frozen perfectly solid, caused by the waves lashing over the sides and freezing. My oars were thickly coated with ice.

"'I crossed the channel with my boat in this condition, and found George Clark, George Haveland, and James Hendrickson, all of the Fifty-second Indiana Infantry, still living; the others were all dead. I got them into my skiff, and succeeded in reaching the shore with them. George Clark's feet, hands, and ears were frozen. George Haveland's feet and hands were so badly frozen that they all had to be amputated—the feet between the ankle and the knee. James Hendrickson was very badly frosted; his face, hands, and feet were frozen. I got them all to my house, and dispatched a man to Colonel Wolf, at Fort Pillow, immediately, informing him of the condition and whereabouts of said men. I had to pay the man $20 in United States currency to get him to go, the weather was so extremely cold. I also sent for two physicians, the best that could be had, (there being no Army physician accessible), Dr. Hazard, of Osceola, and Dr. Fain, living at the same place at that time. They came and waited on all the parties until the regimental physician arrived from Fort Pillow, and assisted in the amputation of the limbs above mentioned, and attended them after the regimental physician left, for which services they presented their bills to me, and I paid them the sum of $200 in United States currency, $100 each.

"'George Clark, George Haveland, and James Hendrickson remained at my house until the 1st of April, 1864, before they could be removed, at which time Clark and Hendrickson were removed. Haveland died a few days after, and I had him buried at my own expense. They were in a condition to need continual care and attention during all of that time, both day and night, and I and my family did much of the nursing. It was well worth the sum of $6 per day to take care of them as we did, and we took care of them ninety days, as charged in the account. Besides, there was nearly $300 worth of bedding destroyed by them, for which there is no charge made in the foregoing account. Colonel Wolf responded to my message by sending out twenty-five men and the regimental physician on the morning of January 2, 1864, with instructions to take said men into the fort, but they were unable to be removed and they all remained fifteen days. They had no provisions with them, and I boarded them during that time. It was worth $25 per day to board the twenty-five men, and I boarded them fifteen days. There were four nurses in addition to the twenty-five men, who remained from the 1st of January, 1864, until the 3d of March, 1864 (62 days). It was worth $4 per day to board the four nurses. Provisions were very high and scarce. I furnished medicines to the value of $50. I made several trips to Memphis for medicines (a distance of 75 miles), but I do not include my expense in the above charge; the medicines charged for actually cost me more than $100. No vouchers or receipts were ever asked or given for any of the above services, board, medicines, or money paid, nor has the same ever been included in any claim presented to Congress, any court, Department, or officer of the United States, or to any other authority.'

"The papers to which reference is made in the memorial of claimant have been furnished this committee, and they find the claim stated as follows:

To board of 25 men, Fifty-second Indiana Volunteer Infantry, from January 1, 1864, to January 15, 1864, 15 days, at $25 per day	$375 00
Boarding 4 men belonging to Fifty-second Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, from January 1, 1864, to March 3, 1864, 62 days, at $4 per day	248 00
Nursing 3 soldiers of same regiment from January 1, 1864, to April 1, 1864, 91 days, at $6 per day	546 00
To medicines	50 00
To amount paid Drs. Hazard and Fain	200 00
To services in taking care of soldiers and for household effects damaged	500 00
	1,919 00

"The statements of the claimant are corroborated by affidavits of officers who were stationed at Fort Pillow at the time of the occurrence. The loyalty of the claimant is also established by the officers then stationed at Fort Pillow.

"The committee are of opinion that his charges are just and reasonable, and report back the bill with the recommendation that it do pass."

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SHAKOPEE, MINN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1245) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Shakopee, Minn.; reported by Mr. MILLER, from the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Comptroller of the Currency be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow the First National Bank of Shakopee, Minn., to increase its capital stock, in accordance with existing laws, to any sum not exceeding $250,000.

Mr. BEACH. I move that this bill be passed over for the present, retaining its position on the Calendar. Gentlemen interested in this bill no doubt will remember that we passed a general bill covering all cases of this nature. That bill has also passed the Senate, and will no doubt become a law in a very few days. I think there is no use in lumbering up the statute-books with special acts under those circumstances.

Mr. STRAIT. The general bill has not become a law yet, and I know of no reason why this bill should be passed over.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. BEACH. I ask my friend from Minnesota [Mr. STRAIT] whether this bill the bill now under consideration has passed the Senate or not?

Mr. STRAIT. It is on the Senate Calendar reported favorably.

Mr. BEACH. Yesterday, as I understand, they took the position in the Senate that they would pass no more special bills of this kind.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LIEUT. WILLIAM P. RANDALL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1151) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, Lieut. William P. Randall, United States Navy, a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy, with the retired-pay of that grade from the date of such appointment.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let the report be read.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I ask for the reading of the report, together with the letter at the end, omitting the naval record, which is of some length.

The report (by Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1151) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy, beg leave to report the same to the House of Representatives with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

This recommendation is based upon facts which are presented in a report made to the House of Representatives, Forty-seventh Congress, which report was adopted by the Committees on Naval Affairs of both branches Forty-eighth Congress, and is also adopted and made a part of this report (Appendix A).

To summarize the case, it appears that Mr. Randall entered the service in July, 1861, as acting master; that he was an officer of conspicuous gallantry and ability, winning promotion from grade to grade until, in March, 1865, he became a lieutenant-commander, with which rank he was honorably discharged from the volunteer service, December 19, 1865. Less than a year later he was appointed in the regular Navy, and in 1870 had reached the rank of lieutenant. After twelve years' service in that grade he was ordered before a medical board to be examined for promotion, and was rejected for the reasons stated in an extract from the report of the board, hereunto annexed and marked Appendix B.

The committee are especially impressed with the fact that the disabilities which prevented his promotion to the rank he now seeks had existed during practically the entire period of his service; that the hernia and deafness were caused by injuries received in the line of duty aboard the Cumberland, and that throughout his twenty years of service they had not interfered with the prompt and entirely efficient performance of his whole duty.

APPENDIX A.

Lieutenant Randall has recently failed of recommendation for promotion to the grade of lieutenant-commander on the active-list because of physical infirmity wholly. But for these infirmities, which are mainly the direct results of hard and faithful service in war, Mr. Randall would have been unanimously recommended for promotion by the examining board.

The record of this officer is an admirable one. The retired-list of the Navy was created and intended for the protection of just such men as Mr. Randall, and we could wish that it contained no names less worthy than his.

Mr. Randall was an experienced navigator at the opening of the war of 1861, and was about to sail in command of a whaling ship at that time. He gave up his command, offered his services to the United States, and on the 24th of July, 1861, was appointed an acting master in the United States Navy. He was ordered to the Cumberland, and served on that vessel at the capture of Forts Clarke and Hatteras, and in the contest with the Merrimac, at Newport News, March 8, 1862, he was in command of the after pivot-gun, which was the last gun fired on the ship in that memorable contest. On the 28th of May, 1862, he was promoted to the rank of volunteer lieutenant, and served on the gunboat Port Royal through the summer of 1862. From January 26, 1863, he commanded the United States bark Pursuit until August 12, 1864, and from that date he commanded the United States bark Restless until February 23, 1865, when he took command of the United States steamer Hendrick Hudson, and remained in that command until March 9, 1865.

On the 17th of March, 1865, he was promoted to the rank of volunteer lieutenant-commander. On the 19th of December, 1865, he was honorably discharged from the United States Navy with the rank of lieutenant-commander.

On the 23d of November, 1866, he was appointed as acting master; March 12, 1868, he received a commission as ensign in the regular Navy, and was promoted as lieutenant March 11, 1870.

Since that time Mr. Randall has served in that rank, and has rendered very valuable service to the Government, as appears by his record herewith reported. His record is without a spot or stain. He was desirous of remaining on the active-list, but when the time for his promotion came he was found mentally and morally qualified, but physically disqualified, and was retired as a lieutenant. We think that his service and record entitle him to retirement as lieutenant-commander, the rank which he reached on his own merits and record in the volunteer service, and before he entered the regular Navy.

In proof of his worth and merits as an officer, we append hereto a letter signed by members of the retiring board and other officers of the Navy. Such an indorsement ought to entitle Mr. Randall to favorable consideration.

NAVAL RECORD.

Lieut. William P. Randall was born in New Bedford, Mass. In 1861 was about to sail in command of a whale ship when the war commenced; was furnished with a certificate signed by the president of every insurance office in the city, to the effect that their offices would insure any vessel under his command at the lowest rates of insurance; without further indorsement was appointed an acting master in the United States Navy, July 24, 1861, and ordered to the United States ship Cumberland, serving on that vessel at the capture of Forts Clarke and Hatteras, and afterward in the engagement with the Merrimac at Newport News, March 8, 1862, at which time he had command of the after pivot-gun (which was the last gun fired from that ship). May 28, 1862, promoted to the rank of volunteer lieutenant and ordered to the gunboat Port Royal, Commander George W. Morris, which vessel did good service on the James River through the summer of 1862, and joined the East Gulf Squadron in the fall of that year. January 26, 1863 (being at that time the executive officer), detached from the Port Royal and ordered to command the United States bark Pursuit; commanded this vessel until August 12, 1864, when he was detached and ordered to command the United States bark Restless; these vessels were engaged in blockading the coast of Florida, and while commanded by Lieutenant Randall did much injury to the enemy, for which he received two complimentary letters from the admiral commanding (Admiral Stribling), with orders to read them on the quarter-deck at muster.

February 23, 1865, took temporary command of the United States steamer Hendrick Hudson (Restless undergoing repairs at Key West), and went to Saint Mark's for General Newton, United States Army, and staff, March 9, 1865. Promoted to the rank of volunteer lieutenant-commander March 17, 1865; detached from United States bark Restless and ordered to take the prize steamer Ruby to New York; arrived in New York with the Ruby April 14, 1865, and waited orders until August 17, 1865, when he was granted four months' leave of absence; on December 19, 1865, was honorably discharged from the United States Navy, with the rank of lieutenant-commander. October 30, 1866, presented himself to the examining board at Hartford, Conn., for admission to the regular service, and was rejected on account of injuries received in the line of duty during the engagement between the Cumberland and Merrimac, but obtained permission from Washington for examination. He presented himself the second time, November 22, 1866, and on December 7, 1866, received an appointment as acting master on temporary service, and was ordered to the United States steamer Peoria, which vessel went to the West Indies and returned with the yellow fever on board. Detached from her in Norfolk, Va., and went to the hospital July 29, 1867; was on sick-leave until September, 1867, when he was ordered to the United States receiving ship Ohio, March 12, 1868 (three years and three days after receiving his appointment as a volunter lieutenant-commander). He received a commission as ensign in the regular Navy October 12, 1868. Detached from the Ohio and ordered to command the United States steamer Leyden December 18, 1868. Promoted to master January 27, 1869, and detached from the Leyden and ordered to the United States steamer Narragansett. Joined the Narragansett in Havana March 17, 1869. In July the Narragansett went in quarantine at Portsmouth, N. H., with yellow fever on board, when he was detached and ordered to the Boston navy-yard. September 1, 1869, ordered to command the United States steamer Palos. In October, 1869, was detached from the Palos and took command of the United States steamer Leyden. Commissioned as lieutenant March 21, 1870.

May 18, 1870, detached from the Leyden and ordered to the monitor Saugus. Joined the Saugus at Havana June 4, 1870. September 30, 1870, detached from the Saugus and ordered to command the United States steamer Mayflower. Detached from the Mayflower November 3, 1870, and ordered to the United States receiving-ship Ohio, navy-yard, Boston. May 5, 1871, temporarily detached from the Ohio and ordered to Key West, Fla., as executive officer, to assist in bringing the Saugus to Philadelphia. June 22, 1871, returned to the Ohio. September 15, detached from the Ohio and ordered to the United Srtes steamer Iroquois. January 15, 1872, detached from the Iroquois and ordered to the United States steamer Canandaigua. August 4, 1874, detached from the Canandaigua at Key West, and sent home by medical survey (with Chagres fever) on sick-leave. November, 1874, ordered to the ordnance department, navy-yard, Boston. June 10, 1875, ordered to torpedo station, Newport, R. I. October 10, 1875, detached from torpedo station and ordered to the United States receiving-ship Ohio, navy-yard, Boston. October 28, Ohio's crew all transferred to the receiving-ship Wabash. April 16, 1877, granted six months' leave of absence. October 15, 1877, ordered back to the United States receiving-ship Wabash. September 2, 1878, ordered to the Ranger, Asiatic station, as executive officer. Detached from the Ranger February 20, 1880. March 10, 1881, ordered as member of a board to organize search for the steamer Jeannette. April 7, 1881, ordered to special duty under the Bureau of Navigation. Placed on the retired-list of the Navy February 15, 1882.

WASHINGTON CITY, February 17, 1882.

In consideration of the good record and long service of Lieut. William P. Randall, United States Navy, and as the disabilities that prevented his promotion on the active list are physical and incurred in the line of duty, the undersigned believe that if he is placed on the retired-list of the Navy with the rank of lieutenant-commander it will be an act of justice to a deserving officer who held this rank during the late civil war.

APPENDIX B.

WASHINGTON, February 10, 1882.

[Extract from the report of the medical examining board for promotion in the United States Navy in the case of William P. Randall, lieutenant, United States Navy.]

Each member of the board then proceeded to make a careful physical examination of the candidate, which being concluded, the board decided thereupon as follows: We hereby certify that Lieut. W. P. Randall, United States Navy, is not physically qualified to perform all his duties at sea, and do not recommend him for promotion. He has right inguinal hernia, which, according to a written statement made by Medical Director Charles Martin, United States Navy, and which was presented to the board, occurred in the line of duty on board the United States ship Cumberland, February 22, 1862. He is nearly deaf in left ear. He is green blind, together with a general feeble color sense.

JOHN C. DULIN, Recorder.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, this bill was considered by the Committee on Naval Affairs, and was unanimously reported, and, unless some gentleman desires to antagonize it, I do not wish to occupy further time, as the bill received the unanimous report of three several Naval Committees since I have been a member of the House.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to antagonize the bill, but to make an inquiry. This officer, I understand, is now on the retired-list, but I did not learn from the report with what rank.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. With the rank of lieutenant. He had served twelve years as a lieutenant, and the time had come for his promotion, and he came up for promotion, but he was found to be partially color-blind, and on account of the regulations he could not be given the rank to which he would otherwise have been entitled.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then this bill proposes to advance him on the retired-list to the rank of lieutenant-commander?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. Yes. He is now on the retired-list as a lieutenant.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will my friend from Illinois [Mr. THOMAS] state what is the pay pertaining to his present rank?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. I can not state it exactly at this moment, but his pay will be at least $175 more.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is that all?

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. That is all.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BENJAMIN M. SIMPSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 61) for the relief of Benjamin M. Simpson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be hereby authorized and directed to reissue and deliver to Benjamin M. Simpson a Revolutionary bounty-land scrip for eighty acres of land.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the report in that case be read.

The report (by Mr. GREEN, of New Jersey) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Private Land Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 61) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to reissue and deliver to Benjamin M. Simpson a Revolutionary bounty-land scrip for 80 acres of land, have had the same under consideration and report that the bill ought to pass. The committee find: It is alleged that Hon. JOSEPH WHEELER deposited a Revolutionary bounty-land scrip, the property of Benjamin M. Simpson, for 80 acres of land, in the Land Office of the Department of the Interior, and that said scrip was lost or mislaid while in possession of the said officers of said Land Office. The following letter from the Commissioner of the Land Office shows that Congressional action is necessary to authorize the Department to reissue said scrip to Benjamin M. Simpson, the owner thereof:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., August 22, 1885.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of an affidavit by B. M. Simpson and a letter from this office to your address, dated the 5th of June last, in the matter of a Revolutionary bounty-land scrip founded on Virginia military warrant 6542, which scrip was some months since lost or mislaid in this office. The affidavit referred to specifies the lost scrip as number 7269, and as filed for the purpose of procuring a reissue or certified copy thereof.

Having been indentified in this manner by number, a careful search reveals the fact that said scrip when issued July 29, 1836, was not recorded. At that time the practice of the office was to record the first or lowest numbered piece issued on any given warrant, and the following pages of the record book only giving the succeeding numbers with the money value of each, to the full satisfaction of the warrant or the full issue of scrip at the time. I know of no law authorizing a reissue of this class of Government obligations. Greatly regretting the accident which has caused this trouble, I am compelled to suggest Congressional action as the only relief to be found.

Very respectfully,

W. A. J. SPARKS,
Commissioner.

Hon. JOSEPH WHEELER, Alabama.

Your committee therefore report back the bill (H. R. 61) and recommend its passage with the following amendments:

Amend section 1, line 3, after the word "Interior" insert "on satisfactory proof of the loss of said scrip."

Amend the preamble by striking out the word "was," at end of third line of preamble, and insert "is alleged to have been."

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state, as the report does not fully develop the fact, that this scrip was placed in the Interior Department a year and a half since under the old administration of that office, and that the loss was occasioned by a change of officers. The officials now in that office were not in office at the time the scrip was presented there, and they think it very probable that their predecessors put it away in some pigeon-hole or filed it somewhere; but a strict search has failed to reveal where it is. I make this statement in order to show that the present officers have not been guilty of any neglect.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to; and the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

H. J. T. MOSS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2463) for the relief of H. J. T. Moss.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Postmaster-General is hereby authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of H. J. T. Moss, postmaster at Saint Jo, Tex., for money-order funds lost in transit, notwithstanding the provisions of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Postmaster-General to adjust certain claims of postmasters for loss by burglary, fire, or other unavoidable casualty," approved March 17, 1882.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask that the report in that case be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 2463) for the relief of H. J. T. Moss, respectfully report in favor of its passage, and hereby adopt the following report submitted by the Committee on Claims in the Forty-eighth Congress, as giving the facts of the case:

[House Report No. 2154, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6661) for the relief of H. J. T. Moss, submit the following report:

The bill is to authorize and direct the Postmaster-General to adjust and settle the claim of H. J. T. Moss, postmaster at Saint Jo, Tex., for money-order funds lost in transit, notwithstanding the provisions of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Postmaster-General to adjust certain claims of postmasters for loss by burglary, fire, or other unavoidable casualty," approved March 17, 1882.

The claimant has made the following affidavit:

SAINT JO, TEX., April 21, 1884.

I hereby certify that on the 26th day of October, 1883, I did place $482 surplus money-order fund in a letter addressed to the postmaster, Sherman, Tex. Said letter, sealed and numbered 26, was placed in register package envelope No. 25, all in the presence of H. C. Frie; placed same in mail-pouch, locked and delivered same to John Bellah, carrier. After robbery made all reports to special agent was required, and last of November wrote to superintendent of money-order business concerning the loss; have sent tracer after registered package No. 25, which tracer shows package received at Marysville, Tex., and not received at Gainesville; also sent said tracer to special agent at Austin, Tex.

H. J. T. MOSS, P. M.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this April 22, 1884.

R. F. SAMPSON,
J. P. and ex officio Notary Public.

The said witness, H. C. Frie, makes affidavit that he was present as stated by the claimant, and saw him place $482 surplus money-order fund in a letter addressed to the postmaster at Sherman Tex.; saw him inclose said letter in registered package envelope No. 25, place the same in the mail-pouch, and lock and deliver the mail-pouch to the carrier. The testimony of Moss and Frie is corroborated by the statement of W. A. Phillips, assistant postmaster at Saint Jo. Sam Bellah, postmaster at Marysville, Tex., testifies that the records of his office show that registered package No. 25, mailed at Saint Jo, Tex., on the 26th day of October, 1883, addressed to the postmaster, Sherman, Tex., was received at his office and forwarded in mail-pouch for Gainesville, in good order, on the 26th day of October, 1883. The mail-carrier, C. H. Smith, states that between Marysville and Gainesville he was stopped by a man in disguise, with pistol in hand, and forced to give up the mail; that the robber cut the mail-pouch and went through the contents, and took one letter therefrom that looked like an official envelope, being of large size. Kate Brown, postmaster at Gainesville, Tex., testifies as to the robbery, that pouches were cut and contents rifled.

"From all of which it is evident that said $482 surplus money-order fund was lost without any fault of claimant. It appears that soon after the loss he wrote to Special Agent Parker at this place concerning the loss, but received no reply. About four months after the robbery he wrote to the Superintendent of the Money-Order System to know how to proceed to get credit for the amount lost, and in reply received a letter from the assistant attorney-general Post-Office Department informing him that the three months had expired in which the Department could adjust and settle his claim, and that his only remedy was by special legislation. He was ignorant of this statute of limitation, and consequently delayed too long in placing his claim before the Post-Office Department. We do not think he should be made to lose said $482, he not having been guilty of any culpable negligence."

The committee therefore report favorably, and recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. LANHAM. The facts stated in the report are sustained by the evidence before the committee. I therefore move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. BEACH. Will the gentleman state when this loss occurred?

Mr. LANHAM. In 1883.

Mr. BEACH. After the passage of the general act to which allusion has been made?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes, sir; in October 1883.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to make a further inquiry. Upon a hasty reading of this report, I do not notice any statement that this official was required by any order of the Post-Office Department to transmit these funds.

Mr. LANHAM. Such was the fact, however.

Mr. HOLMAN. It does not appear upon the face of the report.

Mr. LANHAM. As I understand it, the post-office at Sherman was the depository for the postal funds of this office.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to me while I assure the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that I raised that question in the Committee on Claims and it was investigated there, and we became thoroughly satisfied that the action of this man was in accordance with the post-office regulations.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that where funds are being transmitted as these were by a Government officer in obedience to the orders of the Department and are lost, relief ought of course to be furnished.

Mr. BUCHANAN. There can be no question about that.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID WEBSTER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1464) for the relief of David Webster.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to David Webster, of Concord, N. H., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $302.80, balance due him for travel and attendance as a witness before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department of the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the report be read.

The following report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read in part:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of David Webster for payment of fees as a witness before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, submit the following report:

The facts in this case were inquired into and fully stated in favorable reports made by the Committee on Claims of the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses, respectively, the latter of which reports we adopt, and which is as follows:

"David Webster, of Concord, N. H., on the 20th day of March, 1876, was duly summoned to appear forthwith before the House Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, of which committee the Hon. Hiester Clymer was chairman. Mr. Webster happened to be in the city at the time of the service of the subpœna, but was the next day intending to leave for his home in New Hampshire. He reported to the committee in obedience to the summons, and was informed by the chairman of said committee that he must remain in attendance upon said committee until his testimony was given, and that he must not depart without leave. In obedience thereto he remained, reporting nearly every day to said committee, until the 7th of April, 1876, when he gave his testimony. (See Report 799, first session Fourth-fourth Congress, on 'The Management of the War Department,' pages 415 to 422.)

After he had testified he requested to be discharged, but the chairman of the committee informed him that he would again be wanted. He remained in constant attendance upon said committee until the 8th day of July, 1876, when his papers, which were taken by the committee at the time he gave his testimony on the 7th of April before mentioned, were returned to him, and Mr. Clymer, the chairman of the committee, told him he was discharged.

The evidence shows that Mr. Webster had been in attendance as a witness one hundred and ten days when he was discharged. He claimed pay for that period of time and also for his travel from Concord, N. H., to the city of Washington, 536 miles. He was allowed for attendance only from the 20th day of March to the 5th day of April, twelve days, at $4 a day, $48, and for five days more, at $3 a day, $15, making $63 in all, with no allowance for travel.

It appears that Mr. Webster objected to receiving this amount, but finally took the money, protesting that he was entitled to his lawful fees for the full time and for his travel in addition.

On the 13th of June Mr. Webster addressed the following letter to Mr. Clymer, the chairman of the committee:

WASHINGTON, June 13, 1876.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned most respectfully asks to be discharged as a witness in cases now under investigation before your honorable committee, if in your opinion there is not a positive necessity for being longer detained. I further desire to have my papers returned that your honor stated would be returned to me when I was no longer needed as a witness by your committee.

Be so good as to order an immediate settlement, that I may not be detained from my home in Concord, N. H., any longer than is absolutely necessary.

I am, very truly, yours, &c.,

DAVID WEBSTER.

To Hon. H. CLYMER,
Chairman War Department Committee of Investigations,
House of Representatives.

And in response thereto he was notified by Mr. Clymer that he could not be discharged until further notice. Hence he remained until the 8th day of July, 1876, as before stated.

The memorialist says that at the same time Hallett Kilbourn, esq., was confined in the Capitol for contempt, and that he felt obliged to remain in attendance during the long period he did remain, fearing that if he disobeyed the subpœna he might be dealt with the same as Kilbourn.

Your committee are of opinion that witnesses, when summoned to attend before committees of the House by its authority, and who obey the subpœna by actual attendance, as the claimant did in this instance, are entitled to their pay.

Previous to March 29, 1876 (see House resolution passed March 31, 1872), witnesses summoned to appear before the House or its committees were entitled to fees as follows: $4 per day for attendance and 5 cents per mile for travel in coming to or going from the place of examination. On said 29th of March the following resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives:

"The rule for paying witnesses summoned to appear before this House, or either of its committees, shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, the sum of $3; for each mile he shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination, the sum of 5 cents each way; but nothing shall be paid for traveling when the witness has been summoned at the place of trial."

In this case Mr. Webster resided several hundred miles from Washington; he was here upon expense the whole time, and your committee recommend that he be paid the lawful fees for the one hundred and ten days, being $330, and his lawful fees for travel from this city, where he was summoned, to his home, at Concord, N. H., being 536 miles, at 5 cents per mile, amounting to $26.80 for travel, total $356.80, deducting from which sum the $63 already paid, leaves $302.80 his due, and we report the accompanying bill in order that he may be paid, and recommend its passage.

APPENDIX.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, your memorialist, David Webster, of Concord, N. H., respectfully represents that he was summoned as a witness on the 20th day of March, 1876, to appear forthwith before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department of the House of Representatives, of which the Hon. Hiester Clymer was chairman, and a copy of the summons is hereto annexed.

In accordance with the command in said summons, the undersigned, on the 21st day of said March, appeared before said committee, and was instructed by the said chairman of said committee to remain in Washington, subject to the call of the committee.

On the 4th day of April, 1876, said chairman notified your memorialist to appear before said committee on the 7th day of said April, and in accordance with said notice your memorialist attended before said committee at the time named and gave his testimony. A copy of said letter is hereto annexed. Your memorialist then asked of the said committee a discharge as such witness, in order that he might return home to Concord, N. H. He was ordered not to leave Washington on any account, as he was needed further as a witness, and if he should leave without first being discharged as such witness he would be punished for contempt, and imprisoned the same as Kilbourn, who was adjudged to be in contempt for not answering questions.

Your memorialist remained in Washington to answer to the call of said committee till the end of one hundred and ten days. Your memorialist repeatedly urged upon the chairman of said committee his discharge as such witness, from the 1st of May, 1876, till his final discharge, but was always denied his discharge. On the 13th day of June, 1876, your memorialist addressed a note to the committee urging his discharge as a witness; but said chairman replied that your memorialist must not leave, for the committee had not got through with him. A copy of said note is hereto annexed.

Your memorialist respectfully submits that he is entitled by law to the sum of $440 as a witness before said committee on said summons, and he has received on the same the sum of $63 only. Annexed to this memorial is a copy of the voucher on which said $63 was paid.

Your memorialist respectfully claims that he is entitled lawfully to his fees for travel from Concord, N. H., to Washington and return, and to $440 for his attendance as a witness one hundred and ten days, less the $63 represented by said voucher.

Your memorialist very respectfully asks that an appropriation be made by Congress to pay said claim.

DAVID WEBSTER.

DECEMBER 9, 1880.

STATE OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,
Merrimack, ss:

Then personally appeared David Webster and made solemn oath that all the matters that are stated as facts in said memorial he knows to be true. Before me.

INGHAM CORYELL.

CITY OF WASHINGTON,
District of Columbia, ss:

Personally came before me, James A. Main, a notary public in and for the city and District aforesaid, David Webster, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

I am a resident of the city of Concord, in the State of New Hampshire. I came to the city of Washington in January, 1876, to prosecute a certain claim before the Committee on Appropriations of the House of Representatives, but after waiting a couple of months, and learning that it was not at all probable that said committee would take any action in the premises, I relinquished the matter, and on or about the 20th of March, 1876, prepared to return to my home in the city and State aforesaid, and intended to leave Washington on the morning of March 21, 1876; but at about midnight on the 20th of March I was called from my bed and served with a summons to appear as a witness before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

The next morning I called at the House committee-room at the Capitol to see Mr. Clymer, chairman of the committee, and told him that I was anxious to return to my home, but he answered that I could not go until the committee discharged me; that I must hold myself in readiness to appear before the committee at any moment.

On the 4th day of April, 1876, I received a note from Mr. Clymer, chairman of the committee, requesting me to appear on the 7th of that month before the committee to give testimony, and I went on that day and testified. After I had testified before the committee I asked Mr. Clymer if I might then leave the city and return to my home, and again he answered that I must not go until the committee discharged me, but to hold myself in readiness to appear again before the committee at a moment's notice from him, as "you will again be required after certain witnesses (naming them) have been examined." I waited until the month of May, and not having been discharged I consulted Lawyer Jordan about the matter and requested him and others to have me released from further attendance before the committee, but they met with no success. I frequently saw Mr. Clymer and made the same request of him, but he said my papers that had been offered in evidence had not been printed, and that I would be wanted again.

Some time in the month of June I caused to be written a letter to Mr. Clymer, asking for my discharge as a witness before the committee, the receipt of which he personally acknowledged, and told me I should be fully and well paid for my attendance, as my per diem would be $4, unless he should discharge me and resummon me. And so I remained, to the neglect of my business at home, until about the 8th day of July, 1876, when my papers were returned to me, and Mr. Clymer told me I was discharged then from further attendance before the committee. I was then offered the sum of $63 as payment for my attendance before the committee, but declined to receive it until I should consult Mr. Jordan, my attorney. He told me to receipt the $63, as it would not prejudice my claim for witness fees for the entire period from the date I was summoned until the day I was discharged, and so I accepted the same, and on the 11th day of July, 1876, started for my home. During this entire period I was here at considerable expense to myself, and anxious to return home, but was detained by Mr. Clymer.

DAVID WEBSTER.

[SEAL.] JAMES A. MAIN, Notary Public.

I, James M. Burnham, of Hopkinton, in the county of Merrimack, and State of New Hampshire, on oath say: That I was a Capitol watchman in Washington, D. C., during the spring and summer of 1876. About the 20th of March of said year, Mr. David Webster, of Concord, N. H., informed me that he had been summoned as a witness to appear before the House Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, the chairman of which was Hon. Hiester Clymer, of Pennsylvania, and for weeks and months following I almost daily met said Webster in and outside of the rooms occupied by said committee for purposes of investigation, and had assurances both from the said Webster and others, in whom I had confidence, that the said Webster was holding himself in readiness as a witness pursuant to orders from said committee. The said Mr. David Webster being then as now a resident of my own county and State, with whom I was on quite intimate terms. I kept myself well informed as to what was done by said committee, especially that portion of it relating to said Webster. Many times in said committee-room I have seen said Clymer and Webster engage in conversation; and about the 1st of July, 1876, I heard said Clymer, near the door of the said committee-room, demand of said Webster that he should remain in Washington till discharged—that he (Webster) must not leave the city without his permission. A few hours before said Webster left Washington for home (about July 13, 1876) he angrily and bitterly complained to me concerning the refusal of Mr. Clymer to pay him the entire sum due him as a witness, and said he should leave with a Washington attorney at law, for collection, a bill in full for everything due him as a witness. I am not interested in this claim sought to be established.

JAMES M. BURNHAM.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 27th day of December, 1881. The affiant is the person he represents himself to be, and is a credible witness. Witness my hand and seal this 27th day of December, A. D. 1881.

[SEAL.] JOHN F. JONES, Notary Public.

I, R. W. Browning, of Washington, D. C., being sworn, do depose: That in the spring of 1876 I became acquainted with Mr. David Webster, of New Hampshire. I became aware of the fact that he was a summoned witness before the Committee of the House of Representatives on Expenditures in the War Department; that I was a regular attendant of the sessions of the committee when taking testimony; that I saw Mr. Webster nearly every day awaiting to give in his testimony; that I called upon Hon. Hiester Clymer, at the request of Mr. Webster, and requested the said Clymer to call Mr. Webster as soon as possible, as he was very anxious to get away from Washington; that I was present when Mr. Webster gave his testimony; that in reply to the inquiry of Mr. Webster as to being at liberty to leave the city, the chairman, Mr. Clymer, said, "No; we are not done with you yet;" that I saw Mr. Webster after that in the committee-room and outside, and in reply to my inquiries he informed me that he was still awaiting discharge; that I met him the day of his discharge at the Capitol, when he informed me that Mr. Clymer had just discharged him that day (some time in July, 1876).

CITY OF WASHINGTON,
District of Columbia, ss:

Personally came before me, James A. Main, a notary public in and for the District aforesaid, I, Parker Jordan, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says as follows:

I have been personally acquainted with Mr. David Webster since the spring of the year 1876; that my first knowledge of, or acquaintance with, said David Webster was when he was in attendance before the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department of the House of Representatives as a witness; that in May, 1876, the said David Webster came to me and stated he was in attendance as a witness before said committee of the House, and was anxious to be released from further attendance thereon in order that he might return to his home in New Hampshire, and to that end wished my assistance; that between the time of the coming to me of the said David Webster and the 7th or 8th day of July, 1876, I frequently called personally on Mr. Clymer, chairman of said committee, and requested the discharge of said David Webster from further attendance as a witness before said committee, but that the said Mr. Clymer, chairman of said committee, positively declined at each interview to discharge the said Webster, and positively forbade him to leave the city of Washington until he was discharged; that on or about the 7th or 8th day of July, 1876, I called on Mr. Clymer, chairman of said committee, and again requested the discharge of the said David Webster, whereupon the said Mr. Clymer told me he would, on the next day thereafter, discharge the said David Webster from further attendance before said committee, and I so informed said David Webster; that on the next day thereafter, to wit, on or about the 8th or 9th day of July, 1876, the said David Webster called on me at my law office in said city, and stated to me that the clerk of the committee desired to pay him but for a small portion (I forget how much) of the time that he had been in attendance before said committee as a witness, and that he intended to leave the city without accepting the amount that had been offered him, and return to his home; that as a lawyer I advised said Webster that the acceptance of the amount that had been tendered him would by no means prejudice his claim for fees for the entire period of more than one hundred days that he had been in attendance before said committee; and that upon this advice the said David Webster accepted a certain sum of money, but how much I do not now remember, and left for his home immediately.

[SEAL.] JAMES A. MAIN, Notary Public.

Mr. GALLINGER (before the reading of the report was concluded). Mr. Chairman, the remainder of this report embraces merely documentary evidence tending to sustain what has already been read. It is hardly necessary the Clerk should read further.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, this is one of the many bills which wear a very familiar look—bills which appear in every Congress—sometimes reported adversely and sometimes favorably. I remember——

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, I would inquire who has the floor.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not wish to take the gentleman off the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] was recognized and is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. My request was that the remainder of the report, being composed merely of documents bearing upon matters already presented in the report, be not read.

The CHAIRMAN. The report is being read in the time of the gentleman from New Hampshire, and he can have any portion or all read, as he desires.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. Chairman, this claim may possibly have a "familiar" sound to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] and some other gentlemen on this floor; but it is nevertheless a just claim, and one which, in my judgment, ought long ago to have been paid. As to the gentleman's statement in regard to "adverse" reports, I may say that if any such report has ever been made to Congress on this case I am not aware of the fact. It is a fact that the Committee on Claims in the Forty-seventh Congress, and again in the Forty-eighth Congress, reported unanimously in favor of the claim; but unfortunately for this poor claimant the bill went upon the Calendar and was not reached before the adjournment of the Congress.

The Committee on Claims in the present Congress have very carefully inquired into the facts in this case, and they, like their predecessors in the Forty-seventh and Forty-eighth Congresses, have made a unanimous report that this poor man is entitled to the sum of $302.80 for services as a witness before a committee of this House in 1876. The report embraces a copy of a letter bearing date June 12, 1876, addressed by Mr. Webster to Hon. Hiester Clymer, chairman of that committee. By reference to the files of the House the original of that letter will be found, and it seemed to our committee conclusive evidence that Mr. Webster was detained in this city at that time by order of that committee, and the date of the letter is only a few days prior to the time when he received his discharge and returned to his home in New Hampshire.

I am not here to discuss the question why Mr. Webster was not paid his entire fees. The fact remains that he was detained in this city, that Mr. Kilbourn was at that time incarcerated for contempt in not remaining here as a witness, and the further fact appears that Mr. Webster, in June of that year, addressed this letter to the chairman of that committee, asking that certain papers in the hands of the committee be returned to him and that he might be discharged as a witness. Upon the face of the evidence it is clear to my mind, as it was to the mind of every member of the Committee on Claims, that this man was detained in this city during the entire time he says he was and that he ought to receive compensation for the time he was here under order from that committee of the House of Representatives.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time until I hear any objections that may be made to the payment of this claim.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I remember investigating this claim myself on one occasion. My recollection is—although I have not all the circumstances in mind—that the claim as to this witness having been detained here was denied by the committee before which he appeared. My recollection is (if I am in error of course some gentleman can set me right; I am merely giving my recollection) that this claim was made before the committee of which the honorable Mr. Clymer was chairman. This very claim was preferred there, and that committee before which he had appeared to testify refused to allow more than had already been paid, not wholly because the law did not justify the allowance, but because they did not consider him fairly entitled to more, on the ground that instead of being detained here by the committee he voluntarily remained in the city.

These are my impressions. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] may remember the circumstances more distinctly. This bill was reported adversely, I think, in the Forty-seventh Congress.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Favorably.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Unfavorably.

Mr. TILLMAN. The report in the Forty-eighth Congress was unfavorable.

Mr. GALLINGER. Allow me to correct the gentleman. This bill was reported favorably by the Committee on Claims in both the Forty-seventh and the Forty-eighth Congress.

Mr. TILLMAN. That is very different from my recollection.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. My understanding is that there was an unfavorable report in one of those Congresses, upon the ground that the committee before which this man had appeared and before which the claim was preferred believed he was not entitled to the compensation he claimed. My conclusion was that they, having the facts before them at the time, could form a more correct judgment than we could then or can now.

Mr. SPRINGER. When this case was considered in the Committee on Claims I was of opinion on its first consideration that it was without merit. I asked that the matter be postponed until another meeting of the committee, in order that the subcommittee, with the clerk of the committee, should examine the records of the committee of which Mr. Clymer was chairman to see whether this witness was actually in attendance during the time for which he was claiming payment. That postponement was had and the examination made. The subcommittee found that according to the records of the committee to which I have referred this witness was in attendance as he claimed.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Kentucky. Then why was he not paid?

Mr. SPRINGER. The next question which presented itself was that which the gentleman from Kentucky now suggests, Why was not the man paid? Why did not the committee before which he had appeared audit his allowance and give him a certificate so that he could at that time draw his pay? This matter was not sufficiently explained. That committee did allow him $63 for attendance. But the committee evidently kept him longer than they intended—perhaps they forgot him. Still he was held by their subpœna, and was not discharged until the time he states. It would seem that the committee did not desire to adjudge itself negligent by giving him a certificate for the whole time covered by his claim. His letters asking to be discharged from time to time are on file, but no discharge was given until a few days after the date of the letter referred to by the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

The very question raised by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky was asked by myself in the committee, Why did not Mr. Clymer's committee audit this account? If they kept him here they should have allowed him pay. The law provided that he should be paid. But it seems they did not make the allowance; and this party did not get pay for attendance for the whole time during which, as the record shows, he was in attendance.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. Just one word on this claim. When this matter was before the Committee on Claims it was held in abeyance for some time. We find in this report the affidavit of David Webster, setting out fully and clearly all the circumstances that detained him here as a witness in the city of Washington. It was ascertained by that committee that Mr. Webster is a gentleman of reputable character, as good as any gentleman possibly in the community in which he lives. It is also shown in this report that his statement was corroborated and supported in the main by two disinterested witnesses; and in addition there appears in the file-room of this House the letter of this man addressed to the chairman of the committee asking that he be discharged. It is also in evidence and supported here that he visited the chairman and asked to be discharged, and that he was informed he could not be discharged as he would be wanted again before the committee after certain other witnesses had given their evidence, and he remained here believing if he went away he would be guilty of contempt and be incarcerated and punished.

This case was carefully investigated, and it does seem to me, as far as all the evidence on file is concerned, irrespective of the memory of gentlemen who may have been in Congress at that time, there can be no doubt as to its justice.

Mr. GALLINGER moved that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. TILLMAN demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 57, noes 18.

So the motion was agreed to.

The bill was accordingly laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DAVID W. JONES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1557) for the relief of David W. Jones.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the United States pension agent at Washington, D. C., August 23, 1880, issued a check numbered 63632, drawn on the Treasury of the United States, in favor of David W. Jones, a pensioner residing at Hagerstown, Md., for $1,549.33 in payment of pension then due said David W. Jones; and

Whereas said check was lost while being transmitted by mail in course of collection between the National Park Bank of New York and the National Metropolitan Bank of Washington, D. C.: Therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the pension agent at Washington, D. C., be, and is hereby, instructed to issue duplicate check numbered 63632 for $1,549.33 in favor of David W. Jones for one lost in the mail on the 31st day of August, 1880: Provided, That said David W. Jones shall first execute a bond, with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, to hold the United States harmless against the double payment of said check.

The report (by Mr. GALLINGER) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1557) for the relief of David W. Jones, submit the following report:

The facts in this case were inquired into and stated in a favorable report made by the Committee on Claims of the Forty-eighth Congress, which report we adopt, and which is as follows:

"On the 23d day of August, 1880, the United States pension agent at Washington, D. C., issued a check numbered 63632, drawn on the Treasury of the United States, in favor of David W. Jones, a pensioner residing at Hagerstown, Md., for $1,549.33, in payment of pension then due said David W. Jones. On the 27th of August, 1880, the National Bank of Chambersburg, Pa., remitted said check by mail to the National Park Bank of New York. Said check was duly received by said National Park Bank of New York, and by said National Park Bank was forwarded for collection, with other items, by mail on the 31st of August, 1880, to the National Metropolitan Bank of Washington, D. C. The letter in which were said inclosures failed to reach its destination, and every effort was made to trace it through the post-office, but without success. Said National Park Bank of New York has since received and collected duplicates of all the inclosures in said lost letter, with the exception of said check. Said bank was informed that special provision would have to be made by Congress for the issue of a duplicate. Said check has never been presented for payment.

"In consideration of the above facts, the committee therefore report back the bill, and recommend its passage."

On motion of Mr. GALLINGER, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ADVERSE REPORT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 398) for the relief of Henry Washburn and Thomas Washburn, with an adverse report.

Mr. GALLINGER. This was reported by me adversely, but on motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] it was put on the Private Calendar. I do not see that gentleman in his seat this afternoon, and therefore by unanimous consent I suggest it be passed over informally.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

JOHN A. MORRIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 274) for the relief of John A. Morris.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to John A. Morris, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $117.10, that being the amount of a draft issued by the Third Assistant Postmaster-General which has not been paid, and which draft is now held by said John A. Morris.

The report (by Mr. NEAL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 274) for the relief of John A. Morris, respectfully report as follows:

On the 18th day of March, 1873, the Third Assistant Postmaster-General issued to John McLeod, as part payment on a contract for carrying the mail from Mount Vernon, in Montgomery County, Georgia, to Reidsville, Tattnall County, Georgia, a draft on J. L. Dunning, then postmaster at Atlanta, Ga., for the sum of $190.10. McLeod, for value, indorsed said draft to John A. Morris, who is the present owner thereof. At the time of the indorsement to him Morris was sick, and hence some delay elapsed before the draft was presented at the post-office in Atlanta for payment. When presented, Dunning, the postmaster, on whom the draft was drawn, had departed this life, and his successor declined to pay it.

Morris then applied to the Government for payment, and was informed that in settling with the estate of Dunning the Government had given credit to said estate for the amount of this draft, and that Mr. Morris could sue the estate of Dunning or appeal to Congress for relief. It is not pretended by any one that this draft has ever been paid. Your committee are of the opinion that the accounting officers of the Government should not have allowed the estate of Dunning credit for this draft unless he had accepted or paid it, and the fact that they did so, without the knowledge or consent of Morris, the bona fide holder of said draft, should not, and does not, relieve the Government from its liability for the amount thereof.

Your committee therefore report back the bill with the recommendation that the same do pass.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the bill contain the usual clause?

Mr. SPRINGER. This is not that kind of a case exactly. This is the case of a check sent to the person to whom the Government was indebted, to be paid by the postmaster at the town mentioned. The postmaster died before the check was presented. As soon as the check was issued the Postmaster-General credited that postmaster with the payment of the check. On settling the accounts it appeared his books were balanced, and the check paid by him; but the Government never paid the amount of the check to the person in favor of whom it was drawn, and who was entitled to receive the money.

Mr. HEPBURN. Why not?

Mr. SPRINGER. Because the postmaster died, the Government of the United States previously having credited his account.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Government had a claim against the post master. Was it due to his negligence?

Mr. SPRINGER. It was done in the course of business, and there was no negligence on his part.

There was no objection, and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. SPRINGER moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HATCH reported that the Committee of the Whole House had had under consideration the Private Calendar and had directed him to report back sundry bills with various recommendations.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

A bill (H. R. 1217) for the relief of James Millinger, in accordance with the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, was recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported without amendment, were severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 1877) for the relief of John McNaughton;

A bill (H. R. 79) for the relief of Pryor N. Lea;

A bill (H. R. 1245) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Shakopee, Minn.;

A bill (H. R. 1151) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy;

A bill (H. R. 2463) for the relief of H. J. T. Moss;

A bill (H. R. 1464) for the relief of David Webster;

A bill (H. R. 1557) for the relief of David W. Jones; and

A bill (H. R. 274) for the relief of John A. Morris.

Amendments to the following bills were agreed to, and the bills as amended were ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R 4413) for the relief of William Clift;

(On motion of Mr. WARNER, of Ohio, the title of the bill was amended to read, "A bill for the relief of the legal representatives of William Clift, deceased.")

A bill (H. R. 61) for the relief of Benjamin M. Simpson.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the several votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

Mr. BRAGG. I desire, with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to move that the order assigning Friday for the transaction of private business may include private bills from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless the gentleman from Wisconsin is able to indicate the bills to be considered——

Mr. BRAGG. I have made my motion.

The SPEAKER. Is it for this evening only or generally?

Mr. BRAGG. Generally hereafter.

Mr. MORRISON. I object. I move that the House take a recess until half past 7 o'clock this evening.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past 7 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House (at 7 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) resumed its session, Mr. MCMILLIN in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read a communication from the Speaker of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 26, 1886.

SIR: I hereby designate Hon. BENTON MCMILLIN Speaker pro tempore for the session of this evening.

J. G. CARLISLE, Speaker.

Hon. JOHN B. CLARK,
Clerk House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the order under which the House assembles to-night.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That on each Friday the House shall take a recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 7.30 p. m., at which evening sessions private bills reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions, and bills reported from the Judiciary Committee to remove political disabilities only, be considered.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of the Private Calendar under the special order just read.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. HATCH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in committee for the consideration of the Private Calendar under the order just read. The Clerk will report the first bill upon the Calendar.

GILES C. HAWLEY.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 424) to amend the military record of Giles C. Hawley, and to place his name on the pension-roll.

The bill is as follows:

Whereas it appears from the military record of Giles C. Hawley, late of Company L, Second Illinois Cavalry, that a deafness with which he is affected existed prior to his enlistment in the United States Army; and

Whereas the said Giles C. Hawley avers that said record is false, and by reason of its falsity he is barred from getting a pension, whereto he claims title: therefore,

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to amend the military record of Giles C. Hawley by expunging said averment; and that the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of the said Giles C. Hawley, to draw a pension of $— per month from the —— day of ——, 18—.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to pension Giles C. Hawley."

The report (by Mr. NEECE) is as follows:

That Giles C. Hawley enlisted in Company L, Second Illinois Cavalry, on July 15, 1861, and was discharged November 14, 1861, for disabilities. His military record shows him with his company and regiment all the time from his enlistment until he was discharged at Fort Holt, Ky., on account of deafness.

The surgeon of the regiment certifies in the certificate of disability that he was so deaf that he could not hear an ordinary command, and had been slightly so during his service. In said certificate of disability Captain Delano, who was in command of said company, says that said Hawley is so deaf that he can not hear an ordinary command, and that his hearing has been somewhat defective for several years, so he had been informed by Hawley's friends.

It appears from the evidence that Hawley had been engaged in the mercantile business, at the town of Augusta prior and up to the time of his enlistment. A great number of his neighbors and those who had dealt with him for years just prior to his enlistment testify that his hearing was not defective prior to his enlistment. He swears himself that his hearing was good up to the time of his enlistment.

It also appears from the evidence that Hawley was not sick, and performed his duties as a soldier up to some two months prior to his discharge; that after a hard march and a great deal of exposure the said Hawley caught a very severe cold, and from the effects of which he became very deaf, and never has recovered.

From the evidence there is no question but what said Hawley's hearing was reasonably good prior to enlistment, and that the cause of his great deafness is owing to exposure in the military service; he, being a merchant, probably was not so rugged and hardy as men engaged in other employment. The statement of Captain Delano was based on hearsay only; and admitting all that the surgeon of the regiment says in his certificate be true, "that his hearing was slightly impaired during service," this, in the judgment of the committee, ought not to debar the said Hawley from receiving his pension for the actual injuries he did sustain in the service, which were due to exposure and hard service. But it appears from the evidence that the surgeon of the regiment was not acquainted with said Hawley prior to his enlistment, and as he had no occasion to treat him until after he had taken the cold referred to, and had become sick and deaf from its effect, it does not seem as though the statement of the surgeon in his certificate ought to overbalance a whole community who had known said Hawley and done business with him for many years prior to the war. Since his return from the war the evidence shows him to be so deaf that you can only make him hear by means of a trumpet of some kind.

Your committee is of the opinion that said Hawley's deafness is due to injuries that he received while in the service of the United States, caused by cold and exposure while in the line of his duty, and that he is entitled to a pension.

We therefore recommend that the title of the bill be amended so that it will read "A bill to pension Giles G. Hawley," and that said bill be amended as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Giles C. Hawley, late of Company L, Second Illinois Cavalry, and pay him a pension, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recomendation that it do pass.

AMANDA RODGERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4224) for the relief of Amanda Rodgers.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Amanda Rodgers, widow of Matthew Rodgers, late of Company C, First Regiment United States Dragoons, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws.

Mr. MATSON. I ask for the reading of the report in this case.

The report (by Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 4224, after duly considering it, report it back, recommending its passage with the following amendment: "and that she be paid a pension of $16 per month from the 24th day of November, 1882, during her natural life, in case she so long remains the widow of Matthew B. Rodgers."

Matthew B. Rodgers was a corporal in the United States Army, Company C, First Regiment United States Dragoons, and while in said service he received wounds and injuries, for which on the 2d day of June, 1836, he was granted a pension of $4 per month, to commence on the 20th day of November, 1837, which was subsequently raised to $16 per month, which he was drawing at date of his death, November 24, 1882. He was an invalid for many years prior to his death. Amanda Rodgers is his widow, and shared with him the sorrows of life, cared for him in his afflictions, and laid him in his last resting place. She is poor, aged, and infirm, and the committee recommend that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. MATSON. This bill is reported by the Committee on Pensions. Whether any member of that committee is present or not I do not know. There is no reason stated that I can see why this widow should be pensioned at any higher rate than many others of the aged widows who are seeking relief, and no reason why she should have arrears of pension when arrears are refused to all those who are benefited by special acts of Congress.

I move to amend the bill by striking out that portion which provides for arrears of pension, and also that provision which fixes the rate of pension at $16 per month, and insert that she be placed upon the pension-roll subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I reported that bill from the Committee on Pensions; and the reason the committee fixed the amount at $16 per month was because the husband of this widow, Amanda Rodgers, was a long time in the service, and his pension was finally increased, I believe by special act of Congress, to $16 per month. As she was aged and infirm, the committee supposed it would be right to give her the same pension that her husband was drawing at the time of his death, during the few remaining years of her life, to commence from the date of his death. That is the reason which influenced the committee, and we thought it right to report the bill in this shape believing it would meet the approval of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill as proposed to be amended.

The bill was again read as proposed to be amended.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, I suppose, will be willing to consent to strike out the arrears?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Indiana.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. DOCKERY. I request, Mr. Chairman, that an order be made to have the reports in all of these cases printed although their reading may not be called for.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection that order will be made.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

LIZZIE KENAMORE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4112) granting a pension to Lizzie Kenamore.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lizzie Kenamore, widow of Grant A. Kenamore, late captain of Company D, Forty-eighth Regiment Missouri Infantry, and pay her a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

We find that the claimant is the widow of Capt. Grant A. Kenamore, of Company D, Forty-eighth Missouri Volunteers. Captain Kenamore served in Company G, Ninth Missouri State Militia, from April 1, 1863, to September 21, 1864, and in Company D, Forty-eighth Missouri, from September 22, 1864, to March 23, 1865.

On the 29th of August, 1882, he filed application for pension, alleging that while in the line of duty making the grand rounds as officer of the day at or near Rollo, Mo., about December 1, 1864, his horse fell and his left arm was broken at the elbow-joint, his left shoulder badly injured, and his upper lip split open. The lip has never healed, and he can only take food now in a liquid form. In January, 1865, the claim was allowed, and he was granted a pension for the injury to the elbow.

The injury to the lip developed into a cancer, from which he suffered all that it would seem possible for a human being to suffer, and from which he died July 7, 1865. The Department rejected the claim for pension for cancer on the ground that the cancer was not the result of said injury. As the cancer was the admitted cause of his death, this decision in the original claim renders it impossible for the widow to establish her case. There is a large amount of evidence showing that the soldier was free from the disease at enlistment. Dr. Hudspeth testifies that he is positive that there was no sore on Kenamore's lip when he enlisted. The only evidence to show prior disability is that of Dr. Hyer, who says, "before the war he showed me a crack in his lip, and I advised him to keep it covered with court plaster."

One other witness thinks he saw soldier with a piece of court plaster on his lip. Captain Kenamore asserted most positively that there was no disease of the lip when he enlisted. Hon. R. P. Bland says, March 24, 1885:

"I know his reputation for truth and integrity in all regards. I know that it is good as the best. He would not make a false statement for any consideration. I am fully satisfied that the evidence of Dr. John Hyer in that regard is a mistake. I know Dr. Hyer, and I do not believe he would knowingly make any false statement; but when he says he thinks the sore on the lip was there before the war, and was treated by him at that time, he no doubt has mistaken dates, as I am credibly informed that after the war Dr. Hyer did examine Kenamore's lip. Dr. Hyer is old and quite feeble, and he is mistaken in this case. Captain Kenamore is at death's door. His only hope and wish is to leave a support for a wife soon to be a widow, one that has been to him a tender friend and support in all his great affliction. His afflictions have been and are terrible. This wound on his lip turned to an eating cancer, that has literally devoured his face. His tongue and throat are nearly gone. He can survive but a few days, or months at most. In the very jaws of death he reiterates the truth that his lip and face were sound before he got this wound in the service. Unintentional injustice has been done him."

After a careful review of the evidence submitted, your committee are convinced that the evidence fails to show that the disease existed at enlistment, and they therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2022) increasing the pension of Ellen M. Mitchell; reported adversely from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, this is an adverse report, and I ask that the bill be laid aside informally for the present, not to lose its place upon the Calendar.

Mr. BINGHAM. I should desire the bill to be taken up at this time for consideration if the chairman of the committee has no objection.

Mr. MATSON. I have very serious objection. I do not think such a bill should pass without the vote of a full House; that is my judgment, and it has been the policy of the committee heretofore in such cases.

Mr. BINGHAM. What does the gentleman mean by a full House?

Mr. MATSON. I mean by a quorum in the House. If the House sees fit to increase a widow's pension to $50 a month there can not be much complaint; but to begin here and establish a precedent, and I think that is the judgment of the committee I represent, is objectionable. I know it would not be satisfactory to the committee.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no desire, of course, to antagonize all of the other bills that are upon the Calendar; and yet, at the same time, I should like to be able to make some arrangement with the chairman of the committee whereby we could get this bill before a full House. I have no desire to block legislation——

Mr. MATSON. I have no knowledge as to when the bill will be reached.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the chairman will indicate how we can get the bill before a full House it will be satisfactory to me to postpone it until that time.

Mr. MATSON. The bill may be reported—I have no objection to that—reported to the House adversely, for the action of the House to-morrow——

Mr. BINGHAM. It can not be taken up to-morrow.

Mr. MATSON. Or on some other day when a quorum of the House is present. Next Friday, for instance, it will stand upon the Calendar at that point, and may be reached by consent.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have no objection if that can be done.

Mr. MATSON. And let it be understood that it is to be discussed for fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. BINGHAM. In recognition of the rule of the House to which the gentleman refers I do not wish to press the consideration to-night.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. I submit the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions can not make an arrangement of that kind; that the bill shall be discussed for fifteen minutes on each side.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from Indiana will permit me to state that that comes as a matter of course after the previous question is ordered on a bill without debate. The rules provide for that, and it would come as a matter of parliamentary law.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes, sir, if the previous question is ordered; but I do not suppose any one who wants to pass the bill would want to move the previous question.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then it would come up without any limit on the debate. That would be the effect of it if the previous question was not ordered.

Mr. BINGHAM. Then I understand the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], as chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania the gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that this bill be laid aside and reported to the House adversely, with the understanding it shall be brought up before the House next Friday as unfinished business or when business of this character is reached.

Mr. BRADY. Will that alter the special order? I understand there is a special order by which these pension bills come up for consideration each Friday evening. Will this proposed action change the effect of the special order and permit the bill to come up next Friday?

The CHAIRMAN. If it goes over as unfinished business it will come up next Friday after the morning hour.

Mr. BRADY. Then it can come up at that time under the proposed arrangement notwithstanding the special order?

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLIN. The special order simply extends the rule, and does not limit it in any particular.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. It is right we should have a clear understanding about this. It has been stated that this will be reached in its regular order as unfinished business. I would suggest that it may not be reached next Friday, because there are a number of private bills that will stand ahead of this on the Calendar.

Mr. McMILLIN. But none of those bills have been reported to the House. This will take precedence of those not reported.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. There are a number of bills on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on War Claims and other committees. Would this bill take precedence?

Mr. McMILLIN. The bills to which the gentleman refers have not passed the Committee of the Whole. This under the proposed arrangement will have passed the Committee of the Whole, and will come up as unfinished business.

Mr. BRADY. It will come up in its turn?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks there is no question about the order in which this bill will be reached. It will come up as unfinished business next Friday.

Mr. BRADY. If this is the understanding, I have no objection. I think, notwithstanding the adverse report which has been made, this is a most worthy case, and we will have no objection to presenting it fully to the House.

Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania. As I understand, this bill will come up in the order of all bills reported from the Committee of the Whole to-night, whether adversely or not.

The CHAIRMAN. Except, the Chair will state, that it will not come up in the House to be finally acted upon as other bills that come up at this evening session reported this evening from the Committee of the Whole. It will go over till next Friday.

Mr. McKENNA. Do I understand this bill will take precedence of other bills on the Private Calendar when it comes up next Friday?

The CHAIRMAN. If the proposed arrangement is made, the bill will be reported to the House adversely, and come up next Friday after the morning hour as unfinished business.

Mr. McKENNA. Then I object.

Mr. BINGHAM. If objection is made we are willing now to consider the bill on its merits.

Mr. McMILLIN. I suggest that the bill be passed over informally for the present.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the bill be passed over informally.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the gentleman who made the objection will withdraw it. This will not bar any other legislation. We have ample time to consider all the business coming before the House.

Mr. McKENNA. I withdraw the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON]? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

MARGARET A. CASWELL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1634) for the relief of Margaret A. Caswell.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Margaret A. Caswell, widow of Egbert H. Caswell, formerly of Company E, Thirty-fourth Regiment of New York Infantry Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred House bill 1634, beg leave to submit the following report:

That in the Forty-eighth Congress a bill similar to this was introduced and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who made their report hereto annexed. The bill passed the House, but was not reached in the Senate.

From an examination of the case this committee adopt the said report as their own in this case and recommend that the bill pass.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred bill H. R. 2473, ask leave to submit the following report:

The petitioner is the widow of Egbert H. Caswell, whose certificate of discharge shows that he enlisted in the service of the United States, in the late war, on the 15th day of June, 1861, for two years, in Company K, Thirty-fourth Regiment New York Volunteers, and that he was discharged March 21, 1863, at Philadelphia, Pa. The surgeon's certificate pronounces one of his disabilities to be a fracture of the tibia while on duty at Bolivar Heights, by falling from a stone wall while engaged in drawing water for his company. The ankle frequently swelled and was at times very painful after walking or standing. At Fair Oaks, Va., May 31, 1862, he received wounds in battle still more serious. J. J. Woodward, United States Army surgeon, testifies that at this time Caswell was disabled by a gunshot wound in the left leg, and also in the right thigh, and that he was rendered deaf in the right ear by reason of the bursting of a shell near that organ. He was forced to use crutches for several months after his discharge. He also received a bayonet thrust through the palm of his right hand.

For his several wounds he was treated in hospitals at Philadelphia and Washington; was reported by his physicians as having partial paralysis of the leg, and that he died, finally, from softening of the brain. It is a fair inference that this result was superinduced by exposure in the service and wounds received, but more directly from the bursting of the shell, which may have caused concussion of the brain. Your committee are of the opinion that he died from the causes before stated, directly traceable to his service, and think his widow should receive some aid from the Government in the form of a pension, and therefore recommend the passage of bill H. R. 2473.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH B. JACKSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1635) for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Sarah B. Jackson, widow of William B. Jackson, late of Company A, Ninety-first Regiment New York Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SAWYER) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1635) for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson, submit the following report:

That in the Forty-eighth Congress a bill for the relief of Mrs. Jackson was introduced into the House, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, who made their report (which is hereto annexed), and the bill passed the House.

The bill then went to the Senate, and was referred to the Committee on Pensions, who made a favorable report February 6, 1885, but it was so late that the bill was not reached or passed. Their report is also hereto annexed.

From an examination of the case, the committee believe it to be meritorious, and adopt said reports as their own, and recommend the passage of the bill.

[House Report No. 1170, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5800) for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson, having considered the same, make the following report:

The petitioner alleges that her husband lost his life by falling from a railroad bridge while attacked by dizziness, resulting from serious wounds received in battle in the service of the United States. It is in evidence that the soldier had his lower jaw shot away in the battle of Hatcher's Run, Va., March 31, 1865. He was discharged because of this wound. The disability was rated total, for which he was receiving at time of death a pension of $8 per month. The records show that he enlisted September 1, 1864, and was mustered in the next day as a private in Company A, Ninety-first Regiment New York Heavy Artillery Volunteers; was discharged July 27, 1865, and died September 18, 1865, up to which time he received his pension, application having been filed in August. His family therefore derived but little good from the pension, his death occurring soon after its allowance. The widow did not apply for pension until March 12, 1877, but it was rejected because "the injury to spine by a fall was not caused by or dependent upon wounds received in the service of the United States."

The widow's affidavit gives the reason for delaying her applications for pension, as well as other facts pertinent to the case. It is as follows: That her late husband, the soldier above mentioned, was a pensioner of the United States; that he returned from the Army to their home in July, 1865, suffering from a severe wound of face, destroying the lower jaw; that, although said wound was healed over, it was very distressing, causing darting pains from the jaw to the top of the head and almost continual suffering; that owing to said wound her said husband could not eat any solid food, and in consequence she had to prepare for him and feed him with liquids from a spoon; that her said husband was before enlistment a sound, healthy man, and was not subject to fainting spells, but after his return he did at several times become unconscious and faint; said faintness was caused, as she veribly believes, by the wound aforesaid and the lack of nourishment which said wound prevented him from receiving.

Deponent further says that owing to this disfigurement of face and the consequent affection of his speech, her said husband was loth to be seen upon the street or spoken to, and therefore rarely went out of the house except to attend his church or prayer-meeting. That about 2 o'clock on Sunday afternoon on or about 17th of September, 1865, her said husband on his way to prayer-meeting was taken with one of his fainting spells, and fell from a bridge, which fall, as she verily believes, so affected his brain and other parts in sympathy with the wound of face that he was not able to rally from the additional injuries inflicted, and that his death in a few hours subsequently, namely, at 8 o'clock next morning, was entirely attributable to the wound for which her husband was pensioned.

She further states that neither she nor any of her friends were thus advised of her rights in the premises, and even if she had been her mental condition of distress would not have enabled her at that time to have considered them; that it was only at the late date, when her condition of need suggested to her mind by friends her rights to a pension, that she sought for the evidence requisite.

She further states that the railroad bridge from which her husband fell crossed the Mohawk River at Cohoes; that said bridge was 25 feet wide and 800 feet long and 60 feet to the bed of the river. There was on each side of the railroad track a walk about 9 feet in width. These walks were habitually used by pedestrians (as also by her husband before as well as after enlistment, on his way to and from the church) who had occasion to cross the river.

Thomas Fitzgerald testifies that he knew William B. Jackson, the deceased soldier herein referred to, since the year 1855; that he knew said soldier intimately when he entered the Army, and saw him when he returned from the Army, and frequently thereafter until his death, which occurred about September, 1865.

Deponent states of his personal knowledge that said soldier was not subject to fits or fainting spells before enlistment, and that his bodily health was good.

Deponent further states that after return from the Army, and until his death, the soldier was subject to fainting spells, which were evidently caused by the wounds from which the soldier suffered, the whole lower jaw being shot away and his condition being very much debilitated.

Matthew C. Cook testifies that he knew the deceased soldier, William B. Jackson, referred to. He saw him fall from the bridge across the Mohawk River at Cohoes. Said bridge was a common thoroughfare, and was used by said Jackson habitually on his way to prayer-meeting, and was so being used when he fell. He helped to pick said Jackson up, and saw that he was badly hurt. He stated to him that he was taken with a dizziness which caused his fall. He had been told by said Jackson's wife and others that his wound caused him to be faint at times, and he believes said wound received in the Army was the cause of the dizziness producing the fall, and of which he subsequently died.

Your committee verily believe that the wound received in the service was the true causation of the soldier's death. The evidence that he was a sound man, and not subject to dizziness prior to enlistment, and that subsequent to receiving his wound he was frequently attacked with vertigo and frequently fell, is amply proven. He was an honest, upright, sober man, and it is not difficult to conclude that his death is referable to his Army disability. Believing this, the committee recommend the passage of the bill.

The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5800) granting a pension to Sarah B. Jackson, have examined the same, and report:

The facts in this case are set forth in the report of the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House of Representatives (H. R. Report No. 1170), made during the last session, as follows: [See House report immediately preceding.]

It appears by affidavit made in 1880 that both of the physicians who attended the claimant's husband after his fall were dead at that time, so that no further or explanatory evidence could be obtained from them.

Upon appeal in 1880 the case was rejected on the ground that the evidence did not show "conclusively" that the deceased was subject to fits, or if he was that they were due to or the result of his wound.

Augusta Scott swears she saw deceased when he fell from the bridge; "that just before falling said Jackson reeled or staggered as though suffering from dizziness or vertigo; that he tried to recover himself, and then fell from said bridge, which caused his death."

Dr. W. Van Steenberg, the surgeon who attended deceased, swears that Jackson, after receiving said wound, was subject to attacks of vertigo, causing blindness and fainting: that he verily believes said wound was the direct and immediate cause of such attacks of vertigo and blindness and fainting, and the cause of the accident which resulted in death. In a second affidavit he swears he attended Jackson till he died; that Jackson told him that from the time of his injury he had "fainting fits," and it was in one of these that he fell; "that Jackson said these fits were caused by his wound, and to the best of my knowledge they were."

There are papers in the case to show that Dr. Van Steenberg's moral and professional standing is good.

Rev. C. A. Waldron, who buried the deceased, says, in a letter of November 17, 1881:

"I recollect his coming back from the war in a disabled condition, subject to fainting spells, and which was the cause of his falling from the bridge. There is no question as to the validity of the widow's claim."

J. H. Masten, the postmaster at Cohoes, has written several letters stating the facts.

That before enlistment he was a sound, healthy man, but after he came back he was subject to fainting fits and loss of memory.

He says:

"It is well known by those best acquainted with Jackson that his illness, which occasioned what resembled epileptic fits (in one of which he fell from the bridge, receiving injuries from which he died), was the direct result of his wound. I have not the slightest personal interest in the matter, but think a great injustice has been done a very worthy and conscientious widow, who is poor and deserving of a pension, considering the circumstances of her husband's death."

Jackson died about six weeks after his discharge.

In view of this evidence and all the circumstances in the case, your committee concur in the report of the House committee, and recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SAMUEL F. GARRETT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1840) granting a pension to Samuel F. Garnett.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Samuel F. Garnett, late a private in Company I, Thirty-ninth Ohio Volunteers, on the pension-roll, and pay him a pension at the rate of —— dollars per month from and after the passage of this act.

The Committee on Invalid Pensions reported the bill with the following amendment:

In line 4, strike out "Garnett" and insert "Garrett."

In line 6, strike out the words "and pay him a pension of —— dollars per month from and after the passage of this act."

And insert in lieu thereof as follows:

"Subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1840) for the relief of Samuel F. Garrett, having considered the same, beg leave to submit the following favorable report:

Claimant enlisted July 4, 1861, in Company I, Thirty-ninth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and served until July 9, 1865, when he was honorably discharged. He applied for pension November 3, 1879, alleging that he was disabled by reason of having contracted chronic diarrhea and inflammatory sore eyes while in the line of duty by reason of exposure and hard service.

His claim was rejected January 12, 1884. The proof is clear and strong that he was and is greatly disabled. Dr. Stableton, who was his father's family physician, testifies that before enlistment he was a sound, healthy young man, free from disease of any kind. The records of the War Department show that he was treated for his alleged disabilities while in the service in Government hospitals.

His officers and comrades testify to his having chronic diarrhea in November, 1861, and sore eyes in 1863, and that he never recovered from either disability during his service. His neighbors, who have known him from boyhood, testify to the continuance of the diseases from the time of discharge, in 1865, up to the present. Drs. Grinnell, Graham, Stephenson, and Connell, skillful and reputable physicians, bear positive testimony to his disabled condition from the causes alleged.

Notwithstanding the rejection of this claim by the Department, the Department examiner, R. G. Charles, recommended its allowance in the following words:

"From my examination of all the evidence in this case, I am of the opinion that the claim should be admitted for chronic diarrhea and inflammation of eyes. I think that claimant has been disabled for performing manual labor during the years from 1863 to 1882 in degree one-half."

All of the witnesses testifying in support of the claim are of the highest character and best standing, and all of them have lived in the same community with the claimant since his birth.

In view of all the facts presented, the committee recommend that the bill do pass.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JAMES L. M'CLARRAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1943) granting a pension to James L. McClarran.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of James L. McClarran, late of Company H, Twenty-third Regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, and pay him a pension from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1943) for the relief of James L. McClarran, having considered the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

The claimant, James L. McClarran, late a private in Company H, Twenty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteers, filed his application for pension June 16, 1877, alleging disability to left hip and side by a fall from a horse in May or June, 1861.

The records in the Adjutant-General's office show that said McClarran was enrolled on the 30th of May, 1861, at Columbus, Ohio, in Company H, Twenty-third Regiment Ohio Volunteers, to serve three years or during the war, and mustered into service on that day at Camp Jackson. He was discharged September 20, 1861, for disability.

Capt. James L. Drake and numerous other witnesses testify to the circumstances under which claimant received the injuries mentioned. The witnesses all concur in the statement that prior to and at the time the injuries were received the company was in camp at Loudonville, Ashland County, Ohio, under orders to be mustered into service, and the said James L. McClarran, in company with Christopher Shank, another member of said company, was ordered by Capt. James L. Drake to go to Napoleon, Holmes County, Ohio, and bring back to Loudonville certain members of the company who had gone home on temporary leave of absence, and while on the road to Napoleon, in the line of duty, and without any fault on his part, he was thrown from his horse, receiving the injuries of his left side and hip, from which he suffered constantly, and on account of which he was discharged for disability in September, 1861.

Christopher Shank testifies that he was with McClarran by order of Captain Drake; saw him receive the injury, helped to take care of him, and was with him till his discharge.

Numerous witnesses testify that said McClarran was sound and able-bodied at the time of enlistment, and that the injuries are of a permanent nature, from which the claimant still continues to suffer.

P. H. Clarke, M. D., examining surgeon, certifies to the disability, and then says:

"He is able to labor but a portion of the time. I rate his disability at three-fourths or $6 per month."

A. V. Patterson, M. D., another examining surgeon, certifies to the disability, and then says:

"In my opinion the said James L. McClarran is one-half (½) of total, $4 per month; incapacitated for obtaining his subsistence by manual labor."

The claim was rejected on the record and the claimant's statements as to time and place of receiving said injury, the statements of the witnesses fixing the time of injury in May, 1861, and the records show him as enlisted May 30, 1861.

There is no conflict in the evidence as to the nature or extent of the injury or the place and circumstances under which it was received. It is not pretended that claimant did not receive the injury as described, but the discrepancy as to time in the testimony of claimant is seized upon as the only ground upon which his claim could be rejected.

Your committee think that it is evident from all the testimony in this case that the injuries received, and from which the claimant has suffered so long, were received in the line of duty, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

D. P. SIMMONS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2159) for the relief of D. P. Simmons.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of D. P. Simmons, late a private in Company F, Eighty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2159) for the relief of D. P. Simmons, submit the following report:

Durand P. Simmonds, private Company F, Eighty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, was enrolled September 1, 1864, and mustered out June 1, 1865. He claims a pension for alleged rheumatism and heart disease contracted in the service and in the line of duty.

This claim was rejected October 8, 1885, on the ground of "there being no record and no medical evidence showing the existence of said disabilities in the service or since discharged. The board of examining surgeons fails to find any disability at the present time. As the alleged diseases are obscure in their character, the lay testimony filed is not considered competent to establish the claim."

The claimant alleges that he contracted his rheumatism and heart disease from heavy lifting and exposure in front of Petersburg, and says that he is unable to furnish the testimony of his regimental surgeon, "as his condition was such before going to hospital that he did not know whether he was treated or not;" and he also alleges that he "does not know the whereabouts of any commissioned officer of his company." He also states that Dr. Graham informs him that he was not with the regiment when he contracted his disability, and Dr. Yorris has been dead three or four years. Dr. Fitch, the only physician who has treated him since his discharge, has moved away, and he does not know his whereabouts; has used patent medicines, and has been treated by his mother since his discharge.

The record in the Surgeon-General's Office is, that claimant was admitted to the hospital October 20, 1864, the diagnosis being malarial fever; that he was admitted to depot field hospital October 31, 1864, with diarrhea, and transferred November 6, 1864; that he was admitted to Campbell's general hospital, Washington, D. C., November 8, 1864, with remittent fever, and returned to duty November 22, 1864. No further record nor evidence of treatment found.

Claimant states that he was detailed to cut and carry logs to build breastworks in front of Petersburg, Va., where he contracted rheumatism and heart disease, and that he was frequently excused from duty by reason of said diseases, with which he has continued to be troubled ever since.

F. M. F. Simmons, the claimant's brother, testifies to the same facts, and says that his brother was taken sick with a pain through his shoulders and heart, and affiant left him in a critical condition at "Plough Barracks." After his return from the regiment he received a letter from him stating that he was unable to do duty, and that he has been failing ever since his discharge. It is stated that this witness' "standing is not first class."

Moses Smith, private, Company F, Eighty-first Pennsylvania Volunteers, testifies that claimant contracted rheumatism and heart disease about the middle of October, 1864, from exposure and overexertion. Claimant contracted inflammation of lungs, was taken away from the regiment, and did not return for a month; when he did return, was hardly able to do duty from rheumatism and heart disease. In later evidence he repeats the above statements substantially. I. Johnson and Richard Campbell testify that they knew claimant intimately for twenty-five years before enlistment, and that he was free from rheumatism and heart disease; also, that since his discharge claimant's health has been broken, he is frequently unwell and unable to work in consequence of said disease.

Two neighbors testify to having lived near him since 1871 and 1872, and that he often complained of rheumatism and heart disease, and also that he has been disabled one-half the time from said diseases.

Salome A. Simmons, who is the claimant's mother, and who states that she has had experience as a nurse and "doctor" for a good many years, states that when he returned from the Army in June, 1865, he was broken in health from rheumatism and heart disease; has had frequent dizzy spells, and pain in his side, and when he "overworked his back would swell in a ridge on the left side of the spine; he has constantly grown worse since his discharge; for a large part of the time has been unable to do any hard work, and is sometimes totally disabled."

Five other parties testified to claimant's being unable to work one-half of the time, and for last two years has been unable to perform any manual labor.

S. D. Freeman, M. D., examining surgeon, testifies that this man has had pleuritis and pericarditis, with effusion of fluid in left pleural cavity; the apex of his heart pulsates four inches to the right of its normal position; pulse is 100 and unsteady; respiration hurried; has the peculiar look of his disease. He rates his disability at one-half. This examination was made July 28, 1881.

E. G. Brown, examining surgeon, July 11, 1883, testifies that after looking him over thoroughly he concluded that he is a subject of a mild intercostal neuralgia. There is tenderness at vertebral point in sixth and seventh intercostal spaces; can discover no organic effects of anything of rheumatic character about joints, tendons, or muscles; can discover no indication of heart trouble in form of murmurs or otherwise. The intercostal neuralgia may produce some annoyance and possibly a slight disability for manual labor, though he thinks it is hardly of a pensionable character.

The evidence in this case is conflicting. The hospital records show that claimant was treated for malarial fever, diarrhea, and remittent fever; his brother says that he was taken violently ill from overexertion, and a comrade (not of the best character for veracity) testifies to the same; his mother, who claims to be a "doctor," testifies to the existence of rheumatism and heart disease; one examining surgeon, under date of July 28, 1881, describes minutely his heart affection, and another, two years later, says he could detect no symptoms of heart disease and no traces of rheumatism, and says it was intercostal neuralgia.

It is hardly probable that Mrs. Simmons, with no medical training, could diagnose an obscure affection of the heart correctly, but adding her testimony as to the outward and visible symptoms to the expert testimony of Dr. Freeman, who gives a very minute diagnosis of the case, your committee incline to the opinion that the claimant is entitled to the benefits of the pension law, and they therefore recommend that relief be afforded him and that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SUSAN WOOLLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 443) granting a pension to Susan Woolley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Susan Woolley, of Indiana, widow of Benjamin Woolley, late a private in Company C, Ninetieth Regiment of Ohio Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 443) granting a pension to Susan Woolley, submit the following report:

A bill for the relief of this claimant was favorably reported by this committee and passed by the House in the Forty-eighth Congress, but failed of consideration in the Senate. Your committee adopt the printed report of this committee, Forty-eighth Congress, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6782) granting a pension to Susan Woolley, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report thereon:

The claimant, Susan Woolley, was the lawful wife of Benjamin Woolley, who enlisted as a private in Company C, Ninetieth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the 6th day of August, 1862, to serve three years, and who was discharged from the service on the 13th day of June, 1865 (the war being ended), having served almost three years.

The evidence shows that this soldier was strong and vigorous at enlistment; that he was a brave soldier, having been wounded twice, once in the left side and once in the right hand.

It is also in evidence that afterward and during the remainder of his term of service he was a constant sufferer from chronic diarrhea and piles.

After being mustered out of service in 1865 he returned to his family a broken-down man, and immediately began treatment with his family physician, but receiving little or no benefit. It is further shown that he left home about June, 1868, for Nashville, Tenn., to procure employment, and succeeded in getting employment in the Quartermaster's Department, United States Army; that while so engaged he was taken down sick and sent to the post hospital in July or August of the same year, since which time no trace has been had of him.

A witness well acquainted with him, and who had lived in the family with him, testifies that she visited him in the hospital, where she found him suffering from his old wound, gangrene having set in. The doctor in charge would not permit her to converse with Woolley at any length on account of his very weak condition. This witness only remained in Nashville a day or two, being there on professional business.

Dr. Kuehne, who was also well acquainted with Woolley, testifies that he saw him at the same hospital, and suffering from his old wounds, and that he is sure, from his condition, that he could never get well.

Two persons testify to reading the death notice in the Nashville newspapers.

The evidence is conclusive as to the domestic happiness of the family.

Two children were born to them, both boys, one of whom died a few years since; the other is badly afflicted, he being insane. At the time Woolley left his family he gave his wife $300, and it was the intention for her to come to him as soon as he became permanently located.

The best citizens of Dearborn County, Indiana, unite in saying that this is a worthy woman; that she has no means for support, except to wash from day to day; that she is now very old, infirm, and in destitute circumstances. It is also shown that she has not remarried since the disappearance of her husband in June, 1868.

The claimant's declaration for pension has been rejected by the Pension Office on the ground that there is no record or other satisfactory evidence showing that her husband died as alleged, and of causes chargeable to his military service. It appears that the records of the hospital referred to, covering the period of alleged death, have been lost, and none of the medical officers in charge of the same can be found.

Sufficient evidence has been presented, however, to convince your committee that the soldier was admitted to said hospital and treated for diseases directly connected with his Army service, and that when last heard of was in such a condition as to preclude almost any possibility of recovery; his relations with his family, according to the evidence presented, were such as could suggest nothing short of devotion to those for whose comfort he struggled, even after he had been badly wounded in the service of his country.

While the Pension Office, upon the evidence presented, could not grant the pension asked for, it is clear that the case possesses merit which should not be ignored by this committee, and therefore they report favorably on the bill, with the recommendation that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

BRIDGET SHERLOCK.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 556) granting a pension to Bridget Sherlock.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Bridget Sherlock, mother of Stephen Sherlock, late of Company F, Fifteenth Indiana Volunteers, on the pension-roll.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 556) beg leave to submit the following report:

A bill for the relief of this claimant having been reported favorably by this committee and passed the House, Forty-eighth Congress, and not having been reached in the Senate, your committee adopt the printed report of this committee, Forty-eighth Congress, as follows:

"The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 556) granting a pension to Bridget Sherlock, have had the same under consideration and beg leave to report as follows:

"Stephen Sherlock enlisted as a private soldier in Company F, Fifteenth Indiana Volunteers, on the 14th day of June, 1861, and served as such until the 23d day of November, 1862, when he was honorably discharged by the order of General Rosecrans upon a certificate of disability given to him as the result of a severe injury received during the siege of Corinth, "resulting in scrotal hernia and numbness and difficulty in using the lower extremities. His case is one of very bad scrotal hernia, caused by a fall over a log, May 10, 1862, in front of Corinth, while carrying a heavy load of rails upon his shoulder for the purpose of building a road over which to pass the artillery and wagons during that memorable siege."

"The above is the language of the certificate. He was the son of Patrick and Bridget Sherlock, who were, at the time of his enlistment, quite old and feeble, and depended largely upon said Stephen for a support. After his discharge he returned to the home of his parents, at Bedford, Ind., and within a few months took employment on the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago Railroad as the conductor of a freight train. It is clearly shown by the testimony of the family physician that his disability continued until his death, and that it had approached a condition of paralysis that would probably have rendered him totally helpless.

"While in the employ of the railroad company, as aforesaid, in leaving the train, and because of his disability contracted in the Army, he fell under the wheels of the train and was so injured that his left foot was amputated. By reason of the weak and enfeebled condition of his blood erysipelas resulted, and he died of that disease.

"Because he did not die of the injury which he received in the Army his mother's claim for pension was rejected. His father is dead, and his mother is now nearly eighty years of age and has no property. The evidence of her dependence at the time of his death is clear and convincing.

"This committee think that, under all the circumstances, she should be pensioned. If the son had not met his death he would have been pensioned long ago upon the record made by the Government as to his injury in the service. He did not get any pension; his mother should, and the committee therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill."

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

ROBERT M'ALEXANDER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 464) granting a pension to Robert McAlexander.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, ordered to put the name of Robert McAlexander on the pension-roll of the United States, subject to the rules and limitations of the pension laws, he being a soldier in the Union Army in the late war, and member of Company F, Eighty-seventh Indiana Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 464) granting a pension to Robert J. McAlexander, submit the following report:

Robert J. McAlexander, late a private in Company F, Eighty-seventh Indiana Volunteers, asks that a pension be granted him for disabilities incurred in the line of duty in the battle of Chickamauga, Georgia, September 19, 1863. The records show that he enlisted in the service August 12, 1862, and was discharged June 10, 1865. He was on detached duty as orderly at brigade headquarters, and entered the battle of Chickamauga a sound and robust man. During the fight a cannon-ball killed his horse under him, and in the fall that immediately followed the pommel of claimant's saddle struck him in the lower part of the bowels and inflicted severe injury to groins.

While there was no eye-witness to this mishap, the surrounding circumstances are such as to clearly establish the incurrence of the injury as stated by the claimant in his declaration.

The claimant's petition for pension was denied upon the ground that there existed no connecting medical evidence from time of receiving injury to the time it developed proper, between the 6th and 12th of June, 1867.

Dr. Charles E. Triplett, late surgeon of the Eighty-seventh Regiment Indiana Volunteers, testifies that he treated claimant on the battlefield of Chickamauga, Georgia, for injuries in the bowels and groins, and told claimant at the time that the injury would result in a double rupture. The doctor further states that claimant was a brave and valiant soldier.

Horace C. Long, late captain of Company F, Eighty-seventh Indiana Volunteers, testifies that he saw claimant go into the battle of Chickamauga with General Vandever and his escort; that soon after the said McAlexander's mishap—which was that his horse was struck by a cannon-ball, and fell upon him, injuring his groins and the lower part of his belly, which subsequently resulted in rupture—he, the affiant, was informed of the fact, as it was near his regiment that the injury occurred. Captain Long states that he was not an eye-witness to the occurrence, but the surrounding circumstances were such that he has no doubt whatever as to the facts as previously set forth. He further states that McAlexander was a brave soldier and faithful to every duty, serving his entire time of enlistment, from 1862 to 1865, in active service, and had he gone to the hospital after receiving his injury he could very easily have had a hospital record sufficient to give him a pension, but as he was full of "eternal grit" he continued in the line of duty although suffering continuously, until honorably discharged at the close of the war.

Other comrades testify to have heard of incurrence of injuries by claimant at the time of the battle, but your committee is of the opinion that sufficient facts have been adduced to show that this is a meritorious case and the claimant justly entitled to the relief provided in the accompanying bill, with the following amendment: Strike out of lines 3 and 4 the word "ordered" and insert instead thereof the words "authorized and directed."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS FERGUSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 533) for the relief of Thomas Ferguson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Ferguson, formerly a member of Company B, Ninety-first Regiment Indiana State Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 533) for the relief of Thomas Ferguson, submit the following report:

The accompanying bill having passed this committee and the House, Forty-eighth Congress, and not having been reached in the Senate, your committee adopt the report of this committee of the Forty-eighth Congress, as follows:

"That Thomas Ferguson enlisted in the military service of the United States as a private in Company B, Ninety-first Regiment Indiana Volunteers, August 10, 1862, and was discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability for paralysis of bladder and chronic diarrhea.

"February 12, 1868, he was pensioned at the rate of $6 per month for atrophy of testicle and penis; March 8, 1869, increased to $8, and November 25, 1873, to $18 per month for spinal disease.

"December 2, 1878, the name of pensioner was dropped from the roll by order of the Secretary of the Interior, on evidence submitted by a special examiner of the Pension Office that the disability for which claimant was pensioned was due to intemperate habits and not to his military service. The evidence in support of this charge is entirely ex parte, and without notice to claimant.

"Dr. E. A. West, of Pleasantville, Pike County, Indiana, testified September 16, 1879, that he has practiced medicine for five years and has treated claimant for spinal disease, and that he has been a constant sufferer from said disease; that he knows these facts from personal observation.

"A. J. Harrington, M. D., of Spurgeon, Pike County, Indiana, testifies (November 9, 1882) that for three years after the war claimant was a sober man, as he knows of personal knowledge; that he is now a man of temperate habits, but he is informed he was dissipated three or four years ago.

"Frederick Gyring, J. M. Fleeneer, Jacob Lyring, Hiram Williams, and Thomas Gourley, all citizens of Pike County, certified to be reputable citizens and witnesses whose statements are entitled to full credit, testify to substantially the same facts as those given by Dr. Harrington.

"We have examined all the evidence in this case very carefully, and find the soldier was discharged from the service on account of the disability for which he was pensioned; that the numerous medical examinations by different United States surgeons and boards all agree as to the nature and extent of his disability, and its continuance from the date of incurrence while in the service and in line of duty to the present, and that a clear preponderance of the evidence is in favor of the restoration of the soldier to the pension-roll, and accordingly your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill."

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

THOMAS SIMPSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3326) granting a pension to Thomas Simpson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Thomas Simpson, late a private in the Seventh Indiana Battery in the war of the rebellion.

The report (by Mr. MATSON) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3326) granting a pension to Thomas Simpson, submit the following report:

This committee of the Forty-eighth Congress reported a bill favorably for the relief of this claimant, the same having passed the House but failed consideration in the Senate. Your committee now adopt the printed report of this committee Forty-eighth Congress:

"The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1924) granting a pension to Thomas Simpson, late of the Seventh Indiana Battery, beg to offer the following report:

"The claimant, Simpson, enlisted January 2, 1864, as a private in the Seventh Indiana Battery. At that time the evidence is conclusive that he was a strong and healthy man.

"George C. Masterman, who was second lieutenant of the battery, testifies that on or about the 22 of July, 1864, at Atlanta, Ga., the battery was ordered into position; that the claimant, with others, was ordered in front of the battery to carry rails to build breastworks; while so engaged the order was given to fire; Simpson not being aware of the order came immediately in range of one of the guns, the concussion of the shell or the powder knocking him down, rendering him insensible for fifteen or twenty minutes, he being so close to the gun that his face was blackened by the powder. That after this occurrence he was never able to do full duty again during the remainder of his term of service; that before this he had always been able to do duty at all times.

"Comrades Fletcher, Johnson, and Deford all testify substantially to the foregoing, saying they were present and witnessed the occurrence and that they can not be mistaken about it.

"The evidence is that there was no surgeon with the battery regularly; that occasionally one would be detailed, but would remain only a short time. The records of the Surgeon-General's Office show that Simpson was admitted to general hospital at Jeffersonville, Ind., May 23, 1865, from New Albany, Ind., as convalescent (no other diagnosis), and returned to duty June 8, 1865. That the regimental records are not on file. Claimant was discharged July 13, 1865, under provisions of General Order No. 27, Department of Kentucky. His neighbors who were acquainted with him before he entered the service testify that since discharge he has not been able to perform labor for at least two-thirds to three-fourths of the time.

"The claimant filed application for a pension in June, 1866, and alleged partial deafness and blindness; also incapacity to do manual labor, caused by concussion. This has been rejected by the Pension Office for the reason that the medical examination does not disclose the fact that applicant was injured to the extent of preventing him from obtaining a living by manual labor. Against this, however, is the testimony of his neighbors, who all unite in saying that they knew him before he entered the service to be a strong, healthy man, and since discharge that he is a broken-down man and not able to do manual labor; that his injury has developed into epilepsy, and at the present time that he is totally incapacitated from earning a living by manual labor.

"Your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill."

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

DELILAH KNILL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2689) granting a pension to Delilah Knill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Delilah Knill, widow of Thomas H. Knill, late of Company D, Second Regiment of Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers, at the rate of $8 per month from and after the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. WINANS) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2689) granting a pension to Delilah Knill, submit the following report:

That Delilah Knill is the widow of Thomas H. Knill, Company D, Second Regiment Wisconsin Infantry Volunteers.

He enlisted April 20, 1861, and was discharged March 23, 1863, on surgeon's certificate for gunshot wound on the back of right hand, completely destroying the functions of the extensor tendons. The wound was received in battle near Gainesville, September 28, 1862. Government granted him a pension for his disability at $6, $8, and $15 per month up to the time of his death, April 19, 1883. The widow filed application for pension in her own right June 17, 1884, which was rejected on the ground that the soldier's death was accidental and not due to his service.

It appears the soldier at the time of his death was attending an engine in the Norwegian Plow Works in the city of Beloit, Wis. It happened, as follows: He was putting rosin on the belt from the main shaft of the engine, for which purpose he stepped on a block used for that purpose, which stood between the wheel and the wall and was about 2 feet high; that in stepping down off the block his foot turned and he stumbled and fell directly into the wheel and was instantly killed. Had he not been crippled in his right hand this would not have happened, because close by the block on his right hand was a bench used for support, which he would have caught and not fallen, but having in his left hand the rosin and the right being crippled by the gunshot received in battle, he was not able to save himself from the fall and consequent death. This is the testimony of J. C. Bokardy, an eye-witness, whose reputation is certified as good.

It seems to your committee that it is not a forced or strained conclusion to connect the death of this soldier with his military service. All the circumstances connected with it are so natural and easy to understand that there is hardly a doubt that if his good right hand had not been rendered useless in the defense of the nation's life, it could easily have saved his own by holding to the support within his reach.

It is further shown that Delilah Knill is poor, and since the death of her husband depends solely on her daily labor for her own and children's support. This appears from the testimony of the present mayor, marshal, and aldermen of the city of Beloit. All the evidence points to the fact that she is the worthy widow of a brave and worthy soldier, and while the Commissioner of Pensions is clearly in the right in rejecting her claim under the pension law, we believe it is a case appealing strongly for Congressional relief, and we therefore amend the bill by striking out all of lines 8 and 9, and recommend that the bill do pass.

The amendment striking out, in lines 8 and 9, the words "at the rate of $8 per month from and after the date of the passage of this act" was agreed to.

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

TOBIAS M. COON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4976) for the relief of Tobias M. Coon.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to place on the pension-roll of his Department the name of Tobias M. Coon, late a private in Company A, One hundred and eighteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, subject to the rules and regulations of the Department.

The report (by Mr. WINANS) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4976) for the relief of Tobias M. Coon, have considered the same and report:

That Tobias M. Coon enlisted in Company A, One hundred and eighteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, August 12, 1862, and was discharged July 5, 1865. He applied for a pension December 23, 1878, alleging disability from gunshot wound in left leg above the knee, received at the battle of Mossy Creek, in the State of Tennessee, December 29, 1863, which has caused continuous and permanent lameness. His claim was rejected February 2, 1885, on the ground that evidence in a special examination showed that claimant was not wounded in the service as alleged. This testimony was given by Isaac Coon and Tobias P. Coon, a brother and nephew of claimant, who were comrades, and in the action when the wound as claimed was received. They say after the charge, while standing in the ranks, they saw the hole in claiman's pants, but that the ball did not enter the leg. Tobias P. said he saw the spot about an hour after it was done; it was black and about an inch wide; that claimant did not leave the company till May, 1864, when he was sick and sent to hospital, and contracted scrofula, to which he attributes claimant's lameness. The hospital records say claimant had "diarrhea acute" in May 1864, and again, in November, 1864, intermittent fever; no mention of scurvy or scrofula. Isaac Coon says his lameness is caused by bone scurvy.

All the testimony agrees that claimant was struck or grazed by a ball at the time and place as claimed, and that the disability exists.

John W. Kincaid, lieutenant Company A, One hundred and eighteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers, says, at a place called Mossy Creek, on or about the 29th of December, 1863, claimant received a gunshot wound of left leg above the knee, causing lameness of left leg; that he knows this fact from personal knowledge.

Surgeon William H. Philips states that he knew Tobias M. Coon, of Company A, One hundred and eighteenth Ohio; that he was surgeon of said regiment from September, 1862, to May, 1864; that in an engagement with the enemy near Mossy Creek, East Tennessee, December 29, 1863, claimant was wounded by the entrance of a ball upon the internal surface of the left knee-joint, just in front of the inner surface of the left hamstring; that said wound was dressed by him for some weeks, when claimant was sent to hospital at Knoxville.

Dr. P. B. Wright and Dr. William Clark both testify that claimant was lame in the left knee; that a scar, apparently made by a small ball or buckshot, was plainly visible, and that a foreign body corresponding to such ball could be felt back of the knee-joint. Dr. Wright says the ball seems lower by an inch or two than ten years ago when first examined by him.

From all the evidence in the case the conclusion of your committee is that the relief prayed for in this bill should be granted. Whether the disability arises from the cause alleged, which the weight of evidence would seem to indicate, or from scurvy, as the brother and nephew say, the fact of disability as claimed exists and is not disputed. There is nothing to show that good and faithful service was not rendered by this soldier. There is no claim of prior unsoundness; none that he was not in line of duty. If in filing his declaration he had claimed to be suffering from the various ills flesh is heir to, then, whether gunshot or scurvy, his just claim for a disability could have been allowed with arrears.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that bill by striking out, in line 7, the word "department," and insert in lieu thereof the words "pension laws;" so that it will read "subject to the rules and regulations of the pension laws."

Mr. BRADY. Mr. Chairman, why not make this bill like all the others, so as to read "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws?"

Mr. MATSON. I accept that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN W. ROBSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2753) for the relief of John W. Robson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the limitations and provisions of the pension laws, the name of John W. Robson, late a private in the Sixth Wisconsin Battery, at the same rate as other soldiers of similar disability.

The report (by Mr. WINANS) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred H. R. 2753, having had the same under consideration, report:

That a similar bill was introduced in the Forty-eighth Congress, and reported favorably, which report we adopt as our own, and is hereby submitted as follows:

[House Report No. 1938, Forty-eighth Congress, first session.]

"The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 3833) for the relief John W. Robson, having had the same under consideration, hereby submits the following:

"The accompanying bill asks that John W. Robson, of Madison, Wis., be placed upon the pension-rolls of his country, subject to all the limitations and provisions of the pension law.

"His case is a sad one, and his cause meritorious to the last degree, the history of which shall be briefly recited.

"John W. Robson, a native of Great Britain, who came to America in 1850, enlisted as a private at Milwaukee, Wis., in the Sixth Battery, Wisconsin Volunteers, September 13, 1861, going at once into training at Camp Utley, Racine, Wis. After training a little less than two months, he was not mustered in, but was discharged, because his body lacked half an inch of the prescribed height. He thus not only lost compensation during that period, but lost his own time and the proceeds of his private business, and was compelled to beat his way home without money, being aided a portion of the way by the kindness of a benevolent lady, who, hearing his parley with the railway conductor, paid the required fare.

"A few months later, being still anxious to serve his adopted country, Mr. Robson was informed by Lieut. A. W. Bishop, now of the regular Army, that the question of under size would probably not be again raised against him, as the needs of the Government were becoming more urgent, and to recruit a company of eleven men and he should have a suitable office as a reward. He therefore recruited in Sauk County, Wisconsin, the company of eleven soldiers.

"In the mean time Lieut. John W. Fancher returned and began recruiting for the Sixth Battery, and wanted Mr. Robson and his recruits. As the Sixth Battery was the one in which he originally enlisted, he went to Milwaukee, taking the eleven recruits, all of whom enlisted with him. Not having a knowledge of the ways of the world, Mr. Robson received no commission for his successful recruiting and enlistment, but went into and through the rebellion as a private, while the credit that belonged to him was enjoyed by Lieutenant Fancher.

"After gathering several deserters and about thirty volunteers, Mr. Robson was sent to the front in charge of them, arriving at Rienzi, Miss., within twenty days and in time to participate in the terrible battle of Corinth, October 3 and 4, 1862, which was the first engagement of the Sixth Wisconsin Battery, that had enlisted more than a year before, and from which he had been excluded, as already mentioned.

"Thus Mr. Robson, by reason of having been discharged for short stature, lacked about ninety days of being able to veteranize under the act of Congress of 1863. Those who enlisted first with him veteranized under that act and re-enlisted, receiving $400 bounty and a forty-day furlough each. He had enlisted with them, but could not veteranize nor receive a furlough or a bounty. He participated in all the battles of his battery, and also served during the period while the veterans were enjoying their bounties and furloughs at home.

"He was mustered out in July, 1865, having fought as long and in as many battles, for half as much money, as those who enlisted at the time of his first enlistment.

"On returning home, he was taken ill with rheumatism, chills and fever, and the malarious diseases contracted during army life. He was better and worse at intervals, sometimes confined to his room, and sometimes able to be out. While partially convalescent, he was asked by Nye J. Gibbs, adjutant-general of Wisconsin, to superintend the firing of a national salute on the 22d of February, 1866, in celebration of Washington's birthday.

"Being an expert artilleryman, which was the reason of the request, he complied, though too ill to attempt any labor or business, and began firing from a cannon relinquished by the Federal Government. The gun, having an imperfection, of which fact, however, he was not aware, exploded a charge prematurely, and severed his right arm at the shoulder and otherwise severely injured him.

"The wounds were at once aggravated by the malarious poisons which his system had absorbed in the South, and which were still further developed and brought into activity by those injuries, and he is not healed to this day. For five years he was unable to walk without a staff, and unable to work. For weeks and months together it was necessary to keep a child or nurse to carry food or drink to his mouth, so deeply were his bones affected by this malaria.

"Finally the insidious poison left the wounded part, and concentrated itself in his head. A portion of the skull bone was cleft; other portions are now loosening; the cranium is bare, cracked and feverish, a source of infinite pain, suffering, trouble, and expense, and in such condition as to render traveling away from home impossible without an attendant.

"Thus Mr. Robson, who served valiantly through the rebellion with his two brothers, is not only disabled for life, but is also an invalid for life. He was ill at the time of firing the salute of February 22, 1866, the direct effects of his army life; but as he had no hospital record, having served every day without a moment's furlough, and as his legitimate army illness was so overshadowed by and merged in with the results of the accident just mentioned that he and his physicians were for the time unable to clearly separate the legimate results of the two, he did not apply for a pension. These same difficulties have ever since restrained him from asking an annuity under the general pension laws, though, with his friends, he never doubted the justness of his claims.

"He was preparing to make an application for a pension when the explosion took place; but after that the physician who attended him (Dr. A. H. Rudd) died; the old war diseases mixed and merged with the wounds resulting from the explosion so that subsequent medical advisers were unable to testify to his exact condition before the injury, though they agreed that his terrible afflictions were originally caused by army life, and thus he has been dragged along, close companions of despair, alternately renewed and deferred hope and poverty.

"If those who wish, in dealing with the soldiers, to make the word of promise to the ear and break it to the heart, desire, they can indeed balance themselves on the technical point that Mr. Robson did not suffer all his disabilities in battle; but he served every day for over three years faithfully and gallantly in the rebellion; the fact that he was one-fourth of an inch under the prescribed standard height deprived him of those bounties, privileges, and emoluments enjoyed by his taller comrades who enlisted with him; he gave his skill and services to fire a national salute in honor of the birth of the Father of his Country, which resulted in shattering an arm and shoulder and intensifying the operations of the malaria absorbed in the Army; in short, he is disabled, one-armed, and an invalid for life, because, and only because, he was a soldier.

"His present deplorable condition of poverty and physical ailments are the direct result of his service to his country, without any qualification or reservation whatever. Because, then, the circumstances attending his disability were such that it would be difficult for him to secure an adequate annuity under the general pension laws, should he, amidst so many recipients of aid by special act of Congress be denied justice?

"Mr. Robson, when the country was in the throes of civil war and the result was quivering in the balance, might have fortified himself behind a technicality and even escaped the draft by showing that he was less than the standard height. But he did not. After being rejected once for this reason he tried again, when times were more troublous, and every faithful, patriotic volunteer was a precious gift, and being accepted in spite of the technicality of short stature, bore the burden of a private gunner to the end of the rebellion.

"Can this great Government, which he helped to save, and for and in whose service he has been physically ruined, now hide behind a paltry technicality, which he scorned in the hour of need, and deny him a few crumbs from our bursting Treasury? This Government must be just if not generous. It has been generous with thousands; let it now be just with this one crippled, sick, and pensionless veteran, the son of a foreign country, who can rest his cause upon nothing but his own merits and the honorable intentions and correct judgment of the Congress of the United States. Do not thrust him aside like an old stage-horse, because the country has had the benefit of his youth and strength, and has no further use for his sick and crippled body, for the time may come when we shall need the services of his young sons now struggling on through the poverty that patriotism entailed upon their father and upon them.

"Wherefore your committee recommends the passage of said bill."

Mr. BRADY. I move to amend that bill by striking out the words "at the same rate as other soldiers of similar disability." They seem to be superfluous.

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FIDELIA A. CHENEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2197) granting a pension to Fidelia A. Cheney.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Fidelia A. Cheney, widow of Charles S. Cheney, deceased, late a soldier of Company G, Ninth Pennsylvania Reserves, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2197) placing on the pension-roll the name of Fidelia A. Cheney, widow of Charles S. Cheney, late a soldier of Company G, Ninth Regiment Pensylvania Reserves, have had the same under consideration and make the following report:

Charles A. Cheney enlisted as a private in Company G, Ninth Pennsylvania Reserves, on the 22d day of July, 1861, and was discharged February 8, 1862. The soldier alleges that, September 12, 1861, while on picket at Great Falls, Md., he took cold, diarrhea, fever, with rheumatism affecting heart and lungs, also partial loss of hearing, for which diseases he claimed pension. He died the 26th day of May, 1885, as is alleged by his widow, claimant under this bill, from disease contracted in the line of duty. The Pension Office rejected the widow's claim because the soldier's death was "not due to disease contracted in the service," alleging that there was no satisfactory evidence that the soldier had rheumatism in the service, and that the record shows that he had an injury of foot at time of his enlistment, "which no doubt accounts for his lameness."

Dr. D. S. Marquis, December 13, 1879, testifies to soundness prior to enlistment.

F. C. Fogarty and Thomas Ryan, neighbors, make joint affidavit as to his soundness prior to enlistment.

Four other parties certify as to prior soundness.

F. B. Swearinger, late adjutant of claimant's regiment, April, 1879, testifies that claimant was discharged for disability.

John B. Bookbank, late captain of claimant's company, testifies, December 13, 1879, that claimant, while on picket at Great Falls, Md., September 12, 1861, became sick, and was sent to hospital by reason of rheumatism. He returned to company after many weeks, and was never after able to perform duty, and was examined by a surgeon and ordered discharged by reason of rheumatism contracted in service.

M. C. Hunter, late lieutenant of claimant's company, December 13, 1879, says that claimant was taken sick at the time and place alleged, and was discharged as an invalid.

Dr. S. A. Craig, January 3, 1882, testifies that he knew claimant thirteen and a half years ago. He was then suffering from rheumatism, heart and lung diseases. These complaints have progressed slowly, year by year, since.

H. A. Eliott knew claimant in September, 1862. He was then suffering from rheumatism and deafness.

Two other witnesses testify the same.

William Gray, in an affidavit September 24, 1881, testifies that he met Charles S. Cheney at Alexandria, Va., some time in the year 1862, at which time he was confined to the house, suffering with diseases contracted in the service.

William Gray, A. B. Smiley, A. S. McDowell, and James Seaton testify that in 1861, up to the time of his enlistment, and for at least one year and a half prior thereto, they saw the said Charles S. Cheney almost daily; that during said time he was employed at Clinton mines, in Fayette County, Pennsylvania, as a tippleman, at which work he made a full hand, and had the appearance of a man in good health; that he showed no indications of rheumatism or heart disease, or any defect of hearing, and they never heard him complain of any of said diseases.

Charles Cheney and Mary A. Cheney, father and mother of the applicant, in an affidavit made December 23, 1881, testify:

"That their said son, from discharge to 1876, was able to do merely light work three-fourths of his time, and since that has been unable to do any work at all; that his hearing was dull when discharged, resulting from fever, and has grown gradually worse from year to year, so that he can now scarcely hear at all; that they firmly believe all the diseases with which he is now suffering are the direct result of sickness contracted in the Army."

On the 13th of April, 1881, the parents testify—

"That at date of and prior to enlistment the applicant was in sound health, able to tipple 3,000 bushels per day; that when he returned home in February, 1862, he was an invalid, emaciated and reduced, and has been an invalid ever since; that his troubles seem to be deafness, rheumatism, and heart disease, the direct result, as they believe from all they have been able to learn, of a severe and protracted spell of camp or typhoid fever, contracted after he entered, and while in, the Army; that he has not been able to do any ordinarily heavy manual labor since discharge."

Dr. S. A. Craig testifies that—

"He attended the soldier since 1878, and that he required closer attention year after year; that during 1884 his visits became more frequent, as he was then confined almost entirely to his house. Immediate cause of death, exhaustion."

An examination of the testimony in this case, which is very voluminous, has fully satisfied your committee of the following points:

(1) That the soldier at time of his enlistment was in good health, and there is no evidence of any prior unsoundness except a slight cut in one of his feet when a boy, which had no connection whatever with the diseases causing his death.

(2) That the soldier while on picket with his command in the field in September, 1861, contracted a severe cold, which resulted in typhoid fever, followed by heart affection and rheumatism, by which he was disabled from further duty in field, for which he was discharged February 8, 1862.

The testimony of numerous witnesses goes to show that the claimant from his discharge continued to suffer from these diseases, which became aggravated from year to year until, as is shown by the affidavit of Dr. S. A. Craig, his attending physician, he died of heart trouble, pulmonary trouble, and exhaustion.

Shortly after claimant's discharge he was granted a pension for deafness, resulting from the attack of typhoid fever in the service.

The attention of those who investigated the case seems to have been directed wholly to this deafness, and which was only one, and, in the opinion of your committee, the least important, of the consequences of the typhoid fever from which he suffered in the Army.

From the evidence, your committee are of the opinion that the soldier died from a sickness the result of disease incurred in the service in line of duty, and they recommend that his widow be granted the relief asked for, and that the bill do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SARAH A. GETTIS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2196) granting a pension to Sarah A. Gettis.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Sarah A. Gettis, dependent mother of Lewis J. Gettis, deceased, late a private in Company I, Thirtieth Iowa Infantry Volunteers, who enlisted under the name of Lewis J. McCoy.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2196) granting a pension to Sarah A. Gettis, dependent mother of Lewis J. Gettis, deceased, late a private in Company I, Thirtieth Iowa Infantry Volunteers, have had the same under consideration and respectfully report:

That an examination of the testimony on file in this case shows beyond doubt the following facts:

The Pension Office, in its review of the case, says:

"There is no question as to death of son in line of duty and of dependence of mother. The point involved is, did the son recognize the obligation and aid in maintenance of mother?"

They concede that he aided to the extent of his ability in support of his mother prior to his going to Iowa, but they reject the claim upon ground of want of evidence of his contributing to her support during his absence in Iowa. As to this point the evidence adduced from some neighbors well acquainted with the family goes to show that the object of his trip to Iowa was to try to secure a home for his mother there, and want of success in a boy of fifteen years of age in an undertaking of that kind ought to be no great matter of surprise, and certainly should not be considered as evidence of any indisposition on his part to contribute to his mother's support. It is further stated that when his mother objected to his enlistment it was urged, and her son consented to the plea, that he could better contribute to her support with his pay.

Soldier in this case enlisted in Company I, Thirtieth Iowa Volunteers, on the 22d of August, 1862, being then a little under seventeen years of age. He went with his regiment to the field, took sick, and was sent to the hospital, and died on the 2d of November, 1862, after a short illness, of disease contracted in the service in line of duty. His mother, Sahah A. Gettis, was, at the time of his enlistment and many years prior thereto, a widow, and yet remains a widow. It is proven that she was at time of soldier's enlistment, and for several years prior thereto, a poor woman without property, and that she now is entirely dependent upon her own labor for support; that soldier was her only child, and that she was up to the time he started to Iowa partially dependent upon him for support, having nothing besides except the fruits of her own labor, which was as domestic or charwoman.

The testimony in this case is very voluminous, and an examination of it has satisfied your committee that the soldier had contributed to the support of his mother prior to enlistment; that he proposed contributing more largely from his pay, but which intentions were, however, frustrated by his early death; that the mother was largely dependent upon him at the time, and stands in need of his services more and more as age advances.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRADY. I move to amend this bill by inserting after the word "pension-roll," line 4, the words "subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

PETER F. SAEMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1988) granting a pension to Peter F. Saeman.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Peter F. Saeman, late of Company I, Seventh Pennsylvania Reserves.

The report (by Mr. SWOPE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1988) granting a pension to Peter F. Seaman, respectfully report:

Peter F. Seaman was enrolled July 7, 1861, at Harrisburg, Pa., in Company I, Seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. May 5, 1864, his company was in action at the Wilderness, Virginia, on which occasion he was captured, and released February 27, 1865. Prisoner of war record shows this soldier captured as above, and paroled at North Carolina Ferry, North Carolina, February 26, 1865.

This soldier claims a pension for hernia, which he alleges occurred while he was a prisoner at Andersonville, and was rejected because "there is no record of alleged disability; inability to furnish testimony showing the existence of alleged disability while in the service or at the date of his discharge." His case was also unfavorably reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions, Forty-eighth Congress, "because there is no evidence of the disability in the military service." Because of the rejection of the claim by the Pension Office, and the unfavorable report upon it in the Forty-eighth Congress, your present committee have made a thorough examination of it. Peter F. Seaman was not present at the muster-out roll of his company, dated June 16, 1864, at which time their three years' service had expired, but he was mustered out April 3, 1865, with remarks, "Captured May 5, 1864, at the Wilderness, Virginia."

With respect to his soundness previous to enlistment, Dr. P. J. Tryon testifies to having been the family physician, but says that he never had him under treatment, and that to the best of his knowledge he was not ruptured before the war.

A. Ziegler, late lieutenant Company I, Seventh Pennsylvania Volunteers, testifies:

"That he was well acquainted with claimant at the time of his enlistment; that he was in good health, was 'examined and passed a creditable examination,' and that the examining officers were particular in not taking any that were ruptured; that on or about September, 1864, at Andersonville, he, the said claimant, was ruptured. This occurred under circumstances unknown to me, as I was not confined in the same prison with claimant."

John Musenker testifies:

"That claimant came to Ashland in spring of 1865, and engaged in business, and that through conversation both he and others became aware that he was ruptured."

Peter Bastian testifies that claimant lived in his house for some years, and learned through conversation with him that he was ruptured, "got worse, and was compelled to wear a truss."

In his statement claimant says that he never showed the rupture to any one, except his family physician, who has since died.

Comrade A. Miller states that he was taken prisoner with claimant; that he was free from rupture when he enlisted, and that to the best of his knowledge he was ruptured at Andersonville, but that it did not come to his knowledge until at Florence in November, 1864.

A. Shipper testifies that claimant was free from rupture when enlisted, and knows he got ruptured while confined in Andersonville, September, 1864.

E. R. Scholl, examining surgeon, under date of December 17, 1878, says that Peter F. Seaman is one-half of total incapacitated from obtaining his subsistence by manual labor; that he has scrotal hernia on the left side, and is obliged to wear a truss.

A perusal of some of the testimony has satisfied your committee of the entire good faith and sincerity of this claimant. The injury is alleged to have occurred at Andersonville prison, and proof of its incurrence is, from the nature of the case, next to impossible, nor can it reasonably be expected.

Nor did he immediately upon his release occupy himself in endeavoring to procure proof to substantiate his claim. He, however, showed his injury to his family physician, who, unfortunately for the claimant, is since dead. If this soldier had been a different style of man to what his letters indicate him to be he might be in possession of such proofs as would satisfy the most exacting. But he says:

"At the time of my enlistment I did not inquire whether I was to receive pay or not. I knew the country was in danger, and that the Government was in need of such men as I was at that time, and I at once left home to serve it. I served it faithfully for three years; was confined for nine long months; was ruptured while in prison, and from that cause can not follow my trade (carpenter and wheelwright)."

Men inspired by such motives do not usually look forward as to how they may be personally benefited; they neglect the "main chance," and it often happens that though by far the most deserving they are the least able to substantiate their claims.

Your committee, however, are of the opinion that this soldier entered the service a sound man; that he was ruptured while a prisoner at Andersonville; that his disability still continues so as to prevent his earning his living by manual labor, and they therefore report this bill favorably and recommend that it do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

M. S. CLAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4103) granting a pension to M. S. Clay.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of M. S. Clay, of Bates County, Missouri, late a member of Company A, Twenty-second Illinois Infantry, and also a member of Company E, of the Fourth Wisconsin Cavalry.

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4103) granting a pension to M. S. Clay, having examined the same, submit the following report:

M. S. Clay enlisted as private in Company A, Twenty-second Illinois Volunteers, June 26, 1861, and was discharged on medical certificate of disability on February 22, 1862. He filed claim for pension on August 1, 1885, which was rejected on December 4, 1885, on ground that disability did not exist in a pensionable degree. In fact, this is the only possible question that could arise in the case, and this decision is based wholly on certificate of board of medical examiners, which is as follows:

"General appearance indicates good health, with the nutritive system in healthy condition; slight tenderness of the lumbar vertebra, and same tenderness on each side of vertebra, more particularly to the right; as objective symptoms are slight we make no rate."

The proof shows that while in the service and line of duty he received an injury to his back while building breastworks at Camp Lyon, Mo., and that he contracted lung disease, for which last disability he was subsequently discharged. The proof also shows that he has been a constant sufferer from his said disabilities ever since his discharge, and your committee believe he is now afflicted in a pensionable degree.

They recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

CUDBERT STONE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 927) granting a pension to Cudberth Stone.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to existing pension laws, the name of Cudberth Stone, late a private in Company H, Fourteenth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteer Infantry.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Cudbert Stone."

The report (by Mr. TAULBEE) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 927) granting a pension to Cudberth Stone, having carefully considered the same, submit the following report:

Cudbert Stone enlisted as a private in Company H, Fourteenth Kentucky Volunteers, on the 3d day of October, 1861, and was honorably discharged therefrom on the 31st day of January, 1865.

He applied for pension on July 29, 1881, and his claim was rejected on the 14th day of October, 1884.

He based his claim on piles, resulting from exposure while in the service and in the line of duty.

His claim was rejected on the ground that claimant was not in the line of duty when he contracted said disease. This conclusion seems to be deduced from a statement made by the claimant to the effect that he was afflicted with diarrhea while he was undergoing sentence of court-martial.

He shows, however, by his own and the affidavit of other credible witnesses that he contracted diarrhea while in the line of duty, and that the said disease of piles was the result of chronic diarrhea and hard service and exposure which he had and underwent while in the line of duty, and that said disease has totally disabled him from performing manual labor of any kind.

In view of the long and faithful service and the high character of the claimant, and the well-established facts that claimant was a stout and able-bodied man, free from all and any disease when he enlisted, and that by reason of his faithful services to his country and the great suffering and hardship through which he passed while in said service his health was permanently destroyed, the committee earnestly recommend the passage of the bill with the title and bill amended as to the orthography of the Christian name of the beneficiary as follows: "To be spelled 'Cudbert' instead of Cudberth,'" to correspond with the muster-roll of said company.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass

JANE W. DEVEREUX.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1100) granting a pension to Jane W. Devereux.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Jane Devereux, mother of George N. Devereux, late of the Tenth Massachusetts Battery, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Jane W. Devereux."

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1100) granting a pension to Jane W. Devereux, submit the following report:

Jane W. Devereux is the mother of George M. Devereux, late private in the Tenth Massachusetts Battery.

He enlisted September 1, 1862, and was killed at Reams Station August 26, 1864. She filed a claim as dependent mother, which was rejected April 29, 1884, on the ground that at date of soldier's death claimant was not dependent upon him for support, "as at that date the husband had a sufficient income for and did furnish the claimant adequate support."

To controvert this statement she submits evidence of neighbors and people who knew her husband well. At one time prior to the war he was well off, but lost his property by indorsing notes. He was a proud, high-spirited man, and resorted to all sorts of devices to make it appear he was fairly well off, and to conceal his condition from his friends and from his wife, and when he died was $3,000 in debt.

Original letters of soldier are filed with the case as proving he contributed to aid in the support of his mother while in the Army, namely: one dated Poolesville, Md., March 16, 1863, says:

"A day or two ago I sent you $35, per Adams Express, which you will receive in a day or so."

Another letter says:

"You will find inclosed $15. After this you may get the money at the city hall, for I shall allot $9 a month to be drawn by you at home."

E. W. Johnson, employer of son prior to enlistment, in 1860 or 1861, testifies:

"From various remarks and conversations with him, am convinced the money paid him was given his mother for support."

G. W. Warren, justice of municipal court, Charlestown, Mass., testifies to knowing claimant and her husband for thirty years; well remembered the son George, who was killed in battle, and knew that they were partly dependent upon him for support; knew that the father was embarrassed during the war and up to the time of his death in 1881; that the claimant has not sufficient means for her support.

S. D. Larvin, grocer, Boston, testifies:

"Have been acquainted with John N. Devereux, husband of claimant, for last twenty-five years; have had business connections with him, and at many times conversations with him regarding his financial difficulties; have known he must have been insolvent for the last twenty years. It was difficult to collect bills incurred for family expenses. He seemed to have a dread of appearing bankrupt, and so dragged along, subject to writs of attachment and trustee continually; his embarrassment arose from indorsements."

Charles E. Raymond, Cambridge, of firm of Thomas Dana & Co., Boston, wholesale grocers:

"I had business with husband of claimant during most of the years of my acquaintance, and for many years previous to his death considered him insolvent and of no pecuniary responsibility. Declared his intention of going into bankruptcy, and I furnished him money for that purpose."

Hugh J. Tolland, Boston, testifies:

"Have heard him complain that he could not get money to pay his debts. Am satisfied that during the last years of his life he was continually struggling to pay his debts and provide for his family."

Samuel B. Locke, of Boston, Mass., testifies:

"Knew the late John N. Devereux from 1855 to the date of his death, 1881; well acquainted with his financial standing; know that at no time in that period was he able to pay his debts; frequently lent him money to pay his notes. All the property he represented was mortgaged for more than its value, leaving at his demise not one dollar."

A letter of claimant, November 26, 1883, to Hon. H. M. Teller, Secretary of the Interior, is filed, in which she says:

"My only son gave his young life to his country, and that country amply able to aid me his mother, why don't they do so? Had they left me my son I should not in my old age be left in this condition—asking aid and receiving none."

Since the death of her husband, in order to exist, she has sold articles of her household furniture—things, as she says, they were a life-time collecting.

In view of all the evidence submitted your committee are of opinion that this mother, who is now sixty-five years of age, poor, with no one to aid in her support, should be put upon the pension-roll the few remaining years of her life, believing that the Government deprived her of her son, killed in battle at the tender age of nineteen years, to whom had he been spared she could have looked for that partial sustenance she now asks from the Government. They therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, with the following amendments: Insert in the title between the word "Jane" and the word "Devereux" the letter "W.;" also in the fourth line of the bill the same amendment, so it shall read "Jane W. Devereux."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MARY ANN MURPHY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4538) granting a pension to Mary Ann Murphy.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, to date from October 23, 1863, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Ann Murphy, widow of John Murphy, deceased, late a landsman on the United States steamer Rhode Island, who died October 23, 1863, on account of disease contracted in line of duty in the naval service of the United States.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out the words "to date from October 23, 1863."

In line 8 strike out "on" and insert "in."

After the words "United States," in line 8, strike out the words "steamer Rhode Island, who died October 23, 1863, on account of disease contracted in the line of duty in the naval service of the United States" and insert "Navy;" so that the bill will read:

"Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Mary Ann Murphy, widow of John Murphy, deceased, late a landsman in the United States Navy."

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) is as follows:

Mary Ann Murphy is the widow of John Murphy (second), landsman in the United States Navy, United States steamer Rhode Island, who died in service at the naval hospital, Philadelphia, October 23, 1863, of "ascites." He enlisted November 20, 1862. She made application for a pension November 14, 1862, which was rejected December 8, 1871, because landsman's fatal illness did not originate in line of duty, claimed to be established by affidavit of Dr. Webber, United States Navy, under date of October 8, 1868, as follows:

That John Murphy (second) was on board the Rhode Island at the time I was surgeon of that vessel. He had an attack of ascites, for which he was sent to the hospital. Just before the above-mentioned attack he went ashore on liberty. I was told by himself, or his mates, I forget which, that he became intoxicated and slept all night in the open air, exposed to rain. In a very short time, from one to four days, his sickness commenced. It is possible that the hot climate and his labors in the fire-room (I was told he did fireman's duty, but have no recollection of that) predisposed him to this attack and rendered it more surely fatal.

As against this vague remembrance and hearsay evidence as to drunkenness of sailor, which seems to have been the point of disallowance by the Pension Office, appears the evidence of Lemuel Pope, acting master's mate, and several comrades, as follows:

Mate Pope testifies—

"Quite a number of the fireman and coal-heavers were used up by the excessive heat and hard work in the fire-room. That Murphy, when he came off sick-list, did duty on deck; remembers the affair at Saint Thomas in August, 1863; don't think Murphy was either drunk or overstaid his liberty, for I had charge of the launch that brought off liberty men. Remember distinctly who were drunk and who overstaid their liberty, having had to go and hunt them up. Know that Murphy was not drunk nor overstaid his liberty."

William Sutherland, seaman, John Fitzgerald, fireman, Peter J. Howard, landsman, corroborate the statement of Mate Pope that Murphy was not drunk at the time of liberty at Saint Thomas; that some few of the crew did get intoxicated, but that Murphy did not. Fitzgerald, who was associated with him in the fire-room, says he knows he was complaining from sickness for some time before they went ashore at Saint Thomas, from the effects of the heat and hard work; if he had been intoxicated or had laid out all night he would have known it, being his companion in the fire-room.

John Howard certifies:

"We had no rain or storm when we had liberty at Saint Thomas; the weather was pleasant."

William Sutherland testifies:

"Remember Murphy's going ashore, saw him when he returned on board; he had a paper bag in his arms; he was sober, free from intoxication, and I did not hear he was drunk, and do not believe he was; only two men came on board intoxicated. The men were not allowed to sleep in the streets; the soldiers would have taken them to the barracks. I was captain of the fore-top; previous to this liberty, to my knowledge, said Murphy was in the fire-room; was taken sick; he went on sick-list, and was not well after this time. Most of the men were sick on that cruise. There were two John Murphys on board then. I remember this one, John Murphy, second; I took him in a boat; was one of the hands that carried him on board the Ticonderoga; he was then sick; this was three or four weeks after liberty at Saint Thomas."

As against the hearsay evidence of Surgeon Webber, we have this positive evidence of the attesting witnesses, sufficient to establish the fact, that John Murphy was not drunk when on liberty at Saint Thomas, in any court in the United States.

Your committee believe an injustice has been done this claimant in the rejection of the claim, and they therefore recommend passage of the accompanying bill as amended.

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

WALTER S. HAYNES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1113) granting a pension to Walter S. Haynes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and instructed to place the name of Walter S. Haynes, late a private in Company F, Thirty-sixth Massachusetts Volunteers, on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out, in line 4, the word "place" and insert "restore to the pension-roll."

In line 6 strike out the words "on the pension-roll."

The report (by Mr. LOVERING) was as follows:

Walter S. Haynes enlisted August 6, 1862, in Company F, Thirty-sixth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, and was discharged for disability September 28, 1863. He applied for a pension, which was granted June 16, 1864; certificate No. 29637. He alleged in his original application—

"That on or about July 12, 1863, he was attacked by malarial fever, followed by chills and fever. Soon after an abscess appeared upon his right hip and another upon his right groin, producing great swelling of the abdomen and lower limbs."

He was first pensioned at $8 per month, which was afterward reduced to $6, and then to $4 per month, at which rate he was last paid March 4, 1870, at which time he was dropped from the roll, as the result of an examination during which he admitted to the examining surgeon that he had "slight swelling of the ankles before enlisting." He filed a claim for restoration February 12, 1881, for malarial poisoning and rheumatism, which was finally rejected September 16, 1885—cause: "No disability from malarial poisoning since filing of claim"—prior to which the papers were returned to the chief of the board of review with the following indorsement from the chief of the eastern division:

"I am of opinion that the grounds of rejection on this claim for restoration are not tenable. Aside from the alleged admission of claimant the proof of soundness is all sufficient."

The evidence in support of this claim is certainly of the strongest character as to the incurrence of the disabilities, and the rejection of the claim seems to have been based almost wholly upon the honest admission of claimant as to slight swelling of ankles before service, which is not an uncommon occurrence in the case of people whose business, similar to claimant's (grocery), required constant standing for long hours.

John Burns, M. D., family physician from 1859 to 1862, testifies to claimant's soundness prior to enlistment, and that if he was not sound he should have known it. No recollection of ever having treated him for any cause.

William F. Draper, captain of claimant's company, testifies:

"That when encamped at Newport News, Va., claimant contracted rheumatism, on account of which he was excused from duty, and was under treatment in hospital for same; never able to perform regular duty until he was discharged."

George P. Sanderson, of claimant's company, who was detached as a hospital attendant, testifies that—

"While regiment was at Newport News, Va., after a heavy snow-storm, which broke down many of the tents, claimant was admitted to the hospital suffering from rheumatism, the case being one of the worst that came under my notice."

J. P. Prince, late surgeon of the Thirty-sixth Massachusetts Volunteers, testifies that—

"Soldier was under my treatment for rheumatism during the early part of 1863, for a number of months, exceeding eight, and while an enlisted man, and to the best of my knowledge and belief this disease was contracted in the line of duty; he was constantly excused from duty by me or one of my assistants."

Dr. A. F. Bryant, late surgeon of Thirty-sixth, certifies that—

"Soldier, while in service and line of duty, suffered from rheumatism, disabling him for active duty for a period of ninety days, and more or less till time of his discharge; have seen him since and find him suffering from same disease."

The certificate of disability for his discharge says: "Prostration following and consequent upon malarial disease and difficult locomotion."

J. F. Jarvis, M. D., certifies from 1864 to 1872:

"Saw him every day or so, being near neighbors; knew he was suffering from articular rheumatism, and conversed with him frequently in regard to his condition; in August, 1878, attended him professionally for an attack of subacute rheumatism, chiefly affecting hands and lower extremities; that these are distorted by the disease to such an extent as to incapacitate him from earning a living, and he always will be, in my opinion; the disease was contracted in the Army."

E. N. Whitten, M. D., says:

"In 1870 treated claimant for articular rheumatism, chiefly affecting lower extremities, from which he continued to suffer, and is now (1881) suffering; my opinion is that the disability is permanent."

C. B. Witherle, M. D., surgical house officer, Massachusetts general hospital, certifies:

"Claimant had the middle toe of his left foot amputated at this hospital for a troublesome deformity, apparently the result of rheumatic inflammation in the joint."

The reports of pension examining surgeons are herewith appended.

John G. Metcalf, M. D., Mendon, Mass., says, September 4, 1869:

"Right knee swollen and painful, being attacked by rheumatism; find him with articular rheumatism of the different joints of both upper and lower extremities, at times interfering with his ability to labor; in my opinion present rheumatism had its origin in original disabilities."

Dr. Ormand Martin, 1870, testifies:

"He has no disability from intermittent fever, and none from abscesses of hip joint; he is badly disabled from rheumatism; he has bad swelling of right ankle and knee; that he says he has been very lame since his discharge; he now has large deformed joints of right hand and is feeble looking, and I have no doubt he is very lame in right leg and shoulder; he admits he had slight swelling of his ankles before entering the Army; his disability is total."

The pension examining board at Boston, Mass., February 9, 1881, say:

"We find him a very great sufferer from chronic rheumatism. Left foot is badly drawn, and he has recently had a toe amputated on account of the pain the pressure of the toes together occasioned; his feet and ankles are badly swollen, though he says they are much better than at times; his heart-sounds are weak and distant, and though we get no murmurs, we incline to believe he has hypertrophy of left ventricle. We rate third grade, $18 per month."

The board at Lowell, Mass., January 23, 1884, appear to have spent their time in questioning the soldier as to how he contracted his disability and what he complains of now, and wind up what your committee, from its very great experience in examining this class of papers, do not hesitate to say was a very superficial examination, if indeed any proper examination was ever made, as follows:

"We find no enlargement or deformity of any joint except of the two great toes, which claimant says is hereditary. Heart normal. We rate for rheumatism and results, nothing. The claimant does not suffer from the disability for which he was originally pensioned, nor from rheumatism, and is not entitled to restoration or renewal or any rating."

The board of surgeons at Salem, Mass., under date of June 18, 1885, find him, after a long and most thorough examination, disabled from causes alleged, and recommend that he be restored to the roll, aggregating his disabilities at third grade, $18 per month.

The reviewer of all this evidence sums up his report as follows:

"It is evident that original description of disability did not cover the real cause of the disability, the abscesses which appear to have resulted from rheumatism, and that the pension was paid for rheumatism as appears from the certificates of examination therefor. I think certificate should be reissued to correct description of disability, and to restore from date of last payment at $4 per month, and increased to $8 from August, 1870, and $18 from February 9, 1881, for rheumatism and results."

Your committee are of opinion that all the evidence in the case tends strongly to prove incurrence of disability in the service. That he was a hearty, robust man when he enlisted is clearly proven from his family physician testifying that he never treated him for any cause. The evidence in service shows conclusively in his favor as contracting disability, and all the evidence since service shows he has been a constant sufferer therefrom. We therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill as amended. Strike out the words "on the pension-roll" in the sixth line of the bill; strike out, also, the word "place" in the fourth line and substitute therefor the words "restore to the pension-roll."

The amendments reported by the committee were agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

JOHN P. BRINEGAR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4116) increasing the pension of John P. Brinegar.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to increase the pension of John P. Brinegar, late a corporal of Company E, Fourth Regiment of Kentucky Volunteers, to $50 per month (certificate numbered 114767).

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 6, strike out "fifty" and insert "forty."

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4116) increasing the pension of John P. Brinegar, submit the following report:

We find that claimant enlisted August 6, 1861, in Company E, Fourth Kentucky Volunteers, and was discharged October 3, 1864; that at the battle of Chickamauga, September 19, 1863, he received a gunshot wound in his right side, for which he was granted a pension November, 1871, at the rate of $8 per month. This pension has since been increased as the disability increased, until he is now receiving $24, the injury being rated as equivalent to the loss of a hand.

Dr. D. M. Claggett testifies February 10, 1886:

"I hereby certify that I have this day examined John P. Brinegar, and find an extensive necrosis of the crest of the ileum, discharging a stinking ichorous pus through three tortuous sinuses, one in front of the ileum, one near the back bone, and one near the posterior extremity of the ileum. I have treated him at various times during the past twelve years, and removed several spicula of dead bone. The discharge has been continuous since I first treated him, and very moderate exercise has been sufficient to cause it to become inflamed and painful, and discharge more copiously. He is and has been for past twelve years entirely unfit to perform manual labor, except at the risk of his life, and from the situation of the sinuses at the back he is not able to wash and dress them as they require without the aid of an assistant."

Dr. E. S. McDonald corroborates the above, adding:

"That the wound is so situated as to make it impossible for the patient to cleanse and dress it properly, thereby necessitating the services of a nurse or other person. After a careful examination, I feel warranted in saying that the injury above described greatly endangers the life of the patient from pyæmia and its close proximity to the abdominal cavity. He is a continual sufferer and wholly incapacitated for manual labor."

Hon. A. M. DOCKERY, a member of this House, testifies that he is personally acquainted with the claimant and has been for fifteen years; that he is an honorable man and a great sufferer; he also vouches for Drs. Claggett and McDonald as accomplished physicians and gentlemen of high standing. As the law now is, the Department can fix no rate between total disability and that condition which requires the constant aid and attention of another person. In many respects the condition of the man is much worse than that of a helpless paralytic would be. He is a constant sufferer, requiring a portion of the time the attention of another, and with a disease so offensive as to partially exclude him from the society of friends and neighbors, with no possible hope of recovery and uncertain as to what moment death may come, and with the certainty that any sudden or violent exercise on his part will surely hasten it.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill with an amendment striking out "fifty" in line 6 and inserting "forty."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

J. FRANCIS HOPPER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4918) granting a pension to J. Francis Hopper.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of J. Francis Hopper, late captain of Company C, Sixth Missouri Volunteer Cavalry, and to pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month, to take effect from and after the date of his discharge.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

At the end of the bill strike out the words "and pay him a pension at the rate of $20 per month, to take effect from and after the date of his discharge."

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4918) granting a pension to J. Francis Hopper, submit the following report:

Claimant enlisted June 22, 1861, in Company C, Sixth Missouri Cavalry; was promoted to lieutenant December 28, 1861, and to captain February 16, 1862, and resigned November 17, 1862, on account of ill-health. He made application for pension July, 1884, alleging injury to ribs of left side by horse falling and effects of fever, rheumatism, and heart disease. This was rejected on the ground that no pensionable disability had existed since filing. The medical board of examiners at Leavenworth report him one-fourth disabled; no other examination is shown. Capt. J. C. De Gress, United States Cavalry, testifies:

"That Captain Hopper, on the march from Batesville to Helena, Ark., in 1862, was attacked with fever, the result of malarial influences and exposure, whereby he became wholly unfitted for duty. He suffered from this disease at time of resignation.

"He knows these facts from having served in the same regiment with him and having been instrumental in getting his resignation accepted. He was also intimately acquainted with claimant from April 15, 1862, until his resignation was accepted. At the time his resignation was accepted leave of absence could not be obtained, and his condition was such that he had to resign or die. He could not have survived if he had remained at Helena, Ark. He was utterly used up with fever and rheumatism, and the surgeons gave him no hope of recovery unless by change of climate."

William S. Burke testifies:

"I am personally acquainted with the above-named claimant, having known him intimately since January, 1861. We are both newspaper editors by profession, and worked together in the same office at Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Leavenworth, Kans. At the time I first knew claimant, and at enlistment at Council Bluffs in the Fourth Iowa Infantry, he was a strong, healthy, and able-bodied man, full of vigor, and to all appearances free from any disease whatever. In August, 1862, he returned to Council Bluffs on sick leave as captain of the Sixth Missouri Cavalry, having been promoted from the ranks. At that time he was suffering from bone-break or swamp fever and rheumatism, and was a very sick man. He was treated by Dr. P. J. McMahon, since deceased, and who stated to me on one occasion that he feared Hopper was completely broken down. In January, 1863, he again returned to Council Bluffs. He was much debilitated and broken down by disease. I have known him ever since, and know that by reason of said disease he has been unable to earn his living by manual labor."

William Hickman, a comrade, testifies as to injury by horse, and of his having rheumatism in service. Claimant states under oath that he was treated by Dr. M. W. Robbins, surgeon of the regiment, and by a resident physician by order of Dr. Robbins; that in 1872 and 1878 he was treated by Dr. Davis, whom he is unable to find; that the disease has continued ever since discharge, and by reason of it he was obliged to abandon his work as printer.

The evidence seems unusually clear, definite, and strong. Of its incurrence in the service there can be no doubt. The amount of pension will be decided by the examining surgeons who may hereafter examine him.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment striking out all after the word "cavalry."

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

SILAS S. WHITE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1398) to grant a pension to Silas S. White.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to place on the pension-roll the name of Silas S. White, late a private in Company G, Seventy-seventh Regiment of New York Volunteers, subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws.

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1398) to grant a pension to Silas S. White, submit the following report:

We find that claimant served from April, 1840, to April, 1845, in Company K, United States Infantry, and from November 21, 1861, to October, 1862, in Company G, Seventy-seventh New York Volunteers.

July, 1876, he applied for a pension, alleging injury to back by falling of a sand-bag carried by a comrade while building fortifications before Yorktown, Va. The records in the War Department show that he was discharged upon surgeon's certificate October 2, 1862, on account of "an injury to the back caused by the fall of a sand-bag on him at Yorktown. He is unable to assume the erect position." He was discharged at the New York City Hospital, where he was treated, but can not give the names of the surgeons.

Two comrades of claimant testify in the case, Jerome Hewitt and John Thornton. Hewitt says that he served in the Army of the United States in the war of 1861 in same company with claimant; that their company was employed in 1862 in fortifying in front of the enemy at Yorktown. Knew White before he went into the Army; he was a hearty man. Know that claimant was injured there at Yorktown in line of duty, and that he went to the hospital, and that he went home on furlough on account of his injuries rendering him unfit for service. Knew claimant after his discharge from the Army; lived near neighbor to him, and he was not able to work much for about two years after he came home; could not do more than one-third as much work as before.

Comrade Thornton testifies substantially the same, and adds that he (Thornton) was sent with claimant to the hospital at Annapolis, Md., and from there they were allowed to go home to New York State on furlough. At Saratoga Springs they were examined by a surgeon who pronounced them unable to return, and extended their furlough thirty days; then they started to return to their regiment and got as far as Albany, when White was stopped by a hospital surgeon and pronounced unfit for service, and detained there in hospital a month. They started again for their regiment, and got to New York city, where they were detained and treated by Dr. Vanderbilt for about six weeks, and then discharged.

The report from Sugeon-General's Office shows claimant entered the hospital in New York August 20, 1862, and was discharged therefrom October 6, 1862. Since the discharge of claimant his condition is shown by neighbors who knew him, both in New York and in Nebraska, to be that of one suffering from some affection of his back, and unable to do much, if any, work; as some say, who knew him before his enlistment, "not more than one-third as much labor since service as before," which claimant always claimed resulted from the injury received at Yorktown.

Dr. J. L. Gand, of Humboldt, Nebr., testified, in 1881, to having known claimant over eight years, and has been consulted at different times about his health. He has had partial paralysis of the arms and upper part of the back, which occasionally affects the urethra and bladder. He has been unable to perform manual labor for eight years. His wife is compelled to help him dress and undress, and deponent considers his disease permanent. Deponent thinks his disabilities result from injuries of the spine, which cause the paralysis.

The medical examiner at Falls City, Nebr., in 1878, reports claimant totally disabled. February 9, 1886, Drs. Cox and Williamson, of Humboldt, Nebr., made an examination of claimant and report:

"Find blind piles, which bleed often on defecation; also prolapsus of rectum of an inch in length, at rest; soreness of abdominal muscles, and great tenderness in region of kidneys and lumbar muscles; great pain in defecation and in urinating, with retention at times; indication of diseased condition of kidneys; is unable to perform manual labor for a livelihood; with a disability of three-fourths times at least. This disability reaches back through a period of ten years' personal acquaintance on the part of Dr. J. G. Cox and five years on the part of Dr. A. L. Williamson."

This soldier is now over seventy years of age, unable to perform any manual labor, and without any means of support. He served his country faithfully as a soldier for six years. The country ought to provide for him for the few remaining years that he will live.

Your committee therefore recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

NIRA D. GWYNNE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1361) granting a pension to Niva D. Gwynne.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to place on the pension-roll the name Niva D. Gwynne, widow of the late N. M. L. Gwynne, a private in Company H, Thirteenth Regiment Ohio Cavalry, and that she be allowed a pension of $50 dollars a month from and after the passage of this act.

The amendments reported by the Committee were read, as follows:

In line 4 strike out "Niva" and insert "Nira."

At the end of the bill strike out the words "and that she be allowed a pension of $50 a month from and after the passage of this act" and insert "subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I desire to suggest a formal amendment to insert, in line 5, in lieu of "N. M. L. Gwynne," the full name of the soldier "Nathaniel McLean Gwynne."

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection this amendment will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendments reported by the committee.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendments submitted by the committee. This bill as originally introduced proposed to place the name of this widow upon the pension-roll and allow her $50 a month. In lieu of that portion of the amendment of the committee which proposes to insert the words "subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws" I move to insert "and that she be paid a pension of $24 a month during her natural life, so long as she remains the widow of said Nathaniel McLean Gwynne."

Mr. Chairman, I am reluctant to suggest an amendment which seems to be in opposition to the fixed rule of the House as to granting pensions to widows of deceased soldiers. But, sir, I recognize the fact that there are exceptional cases; that there are cases which when the facts are known require possibly a departure even from this fixed, and I have no hesitancy in saying wise, rule adopted by this House.

This soldier entered the service a mere lad as a private in the Thirteenth Ohio Cavalry. He went through the trials and hardships of the war until disabled July 30, 1864, when he was severely wounded at the battle of Petersburg. What I shall state of the heroic conduct of Nathaniel McLean Gwynne is no fancy picture. In that engagement his regiment lost their colors. Boy that he was, he rushed to the very teeth of the guns of the enemy and rescued the colors. As he was returning with them to his regiment a ball nearly severed his left arm from the shoulder; another minie-ball pierced his knee; but still he clung to the staff of the flag with his right hand, and with its folds in his teeth he carried it back to his regiment. They seized and embraced him as brave men naturally would a young man under such circumstances. For this conduct the Congress of the United States voted him a medal of honor.

He has left a widow and a boy; and I say such an example of heroism, of distinguished bravery, entitles his widow and boy to recognition now that the soldier is dead.

We have said, sir, in language as strong as it could be made that we would provide not only for him who has borne the battle but for his widow and his orphan; and as the Congress of this nation recognized the distinguished bravery of this soldier, let us say to this boy to-day in his home in Missouri, "Thus has the Congress of your country rewarded you and your mother for the distinguished heroism of your father; tread you in his tracks."

I think, Mr. Chairman, if there ever was a case that appealed for special action—for a departure from the general rule we have adopted with reference to pensions—this is that case. I submit it.

Mr. BRADY. I would like to hear the report read.

A MEMBER. What pension did the soldier receive?

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I wish to say that this distinguished soldier—and I use the word "distinguished" understandingly, for it is the acts of such men that render the fame of a Grant or a Sherman a possibility in a nation like ours—drew a pension of $24 a month from 1866 to the time of his death, about a year since. My amendment proposes merely to allow to this widow the same pension which the Government gave her husband during his lifetime.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the report, the reading being called for by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BRADY]. After the reading the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON].

The report (by Mr. MORRILL) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1361) giving a pension to Nira D. Gwynne, submit the following report:

We find the claimant is the widow of Nat. M. Gwynne, who enlisted May 10, 1864, in Company H, Thirteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, and was honorably discharged March 21, 1865; that in the assault on Petersburg, Va., his left arm was so badly shattered that an immediate amputation was necessary. He also received a wound at the same time in his knee. For this he received a pension until his death, January 6, 1883. His widow filed her application for a pension, alleging that he died from the effects of nervous prostration, as a result of these wounds. She is unable to show that the wounds were the direct and immediate cause of his death, and consequently can not receive a pension through the Department. The evidence is very strong that the soldier's death was the result of his injuries received in the service.

Dr. Joshua Thorne testifies:

"I was consulted professionally by Nathaniel L. M. Gwynne about ten years ago, and on several occasions afterward up to about three days before his death, in January, 1883. When I first saw him I found extreme hyperesthesia of the left shoulder and of the cervical spine, with severe pains in the shoulder, neck, and head. I found that the aforesaid pains proceeded from disease of the nerves of the arm, and resulted from the gunshot wound for which the arm had been amputated. I found neural salerosis in the median and in the ulnar, and my opinion was that it was a case of neural sclerosis which had involved the brainial plexus, the cervical spine, and the brain. In subsequent examinations I found the brain to be so involved as to produce frequent attacks of mania, and for some time before death severe neuralgia of the pneumogastric nerves was found. About three days before death I saw the patient and found pains in the brainial plexus, in spine, and head, and cramps in stomach and partial mania. I never saw him after."

Dr. Robert L. Wood, one of the most learned and able physicians of Missouri, says:

"I did not treat Mr. Gwynne for his malady at any time, and I can only speak of his condition as a personal associate. His arm was amputated about 3 inches below the shoulder joint, if I am not mistaken. The injury, which necessitated the amputation of the arm, was so severe that it shattered the bone terribly. The plexus of nerves supplying the arm was literally torn to pieces. In consequence of the fracture it was next to impossible to obtain a healthy stump. The end of the arm bone (humerus) was necrosed. As a result of the serious injury of the nerves to the arm the shoulder wasted away, the shoulder-blade and end of the collar-bone standing out very prominently (muscular atrophy). The stump of the amputated arm was quite often in a state of suppuration. Mr. Gwynne also received a wound in the knee. This knee constantly suppurated. Beyond a questionable doubt the deceased arm-stump and the necrosed knee were the causes, direct and indirect, of his death."

In a letter to the committee Maj. WILLIAM WARNER, a member of this House, speaks of the distinguished services of the soldier as follows:

"Permit me to state that for many years I was intimately acquainted with Mr. Gwynne. He lost his arm at Petersburg July 30, 1864; at the same time he received a gunshot wound in the knee. For two years before his death I was, through business connected with the Grand Army of the Republic, in company with the deceased nearly every day. He was a great sufferer from his wounds, that in the knee being a running sore. Time and time again he has told me of his sufferings from these wounds. His nervous system was broken down, so much so that at times he had no more control over himself than a child. He often said to me that he knew his injuries would cause his death, yet if he had his life to live over again, if his country needed his services, he would cheerfully give them, even with the absolute knowledge that he would be thus maugled.

"This I believe, for no braver man than Gwynne ever entered the Army. As a beardless soldier-boy, on July 30, 1864, he daringly rescued the flag of his country from the very jaws of the enemy's guns; in returning with it to his regiment his arm was almost torn from its shoulder, but he held on to the flag, returning it to the Union line baptized with his blood. For his heroic conduct on that day he received one of the few gold medals which Congress ordered to be presented for distinguished bravery on the battlefield. I do not entertain a doubt that but for his wounds he would have been alive and well to-day. He has left a wife and one child, a boy, in destitute circumstances; let them realize the fact that the country remembers one of its bravest defenders in providing for his widow and orphan."

It seems reasonable to assume that his death was the direct result of his military service. Believing it to be the duty of the Government to provide for this widow and her helpless child, your committee recommend the passage of the bill, with an amendment striking out all after the word "cavalry," in line 6, and inserting "subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws."

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I am glad that the gentleman from Missouri has placed on the record of this Government, both by the letters of the gentleman who made this report as well as his timely and eloquent speech this evening, the heroic deeds of this soldier. That is well. I am glad, too, the Congress of the United States thought fit to give him a gold medal on account of his heroism in battle. But this question, Mr. Chairman, of giving a pension to this widow larger than has been allowed to the widows of other soldiers who rendered perhaps equally as brave and heroic service—for there were certainly some who did that in the many engagements of the war—to give her more than others are drawing, and especially when she must come here to get a pension at all, to ask the favor of Congress, I think would not be right. It would be establishing a precedent for thousands of applications, based upon the special service and the special heroism of the soldier, asking that his widow should be pensioned. Why, it is not only the rule of Congress in relation to special cases, but it is the law itself, that all persons of the same rank shall receive the same pension. That is the law. The law makes no distincton. It can not afford to do so, because when you come to measure these things by individual cases you do necessarily much greater injustice than if you allow that well-established rule to prevail of giving the same pension to soldiers of the same class and rank.

So I insist, Mr. Chairman, we can not safely, notwithstanding the eloquent speech of the gentleman from Missouri, enter upon this precedent in this case.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to add just a word to what has been so well and eloquently said by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. WARNER]. Mr. Chairman, I knew this soldier after the war. I say in neither army during the late strife was there a more distinguished, knightly, or chivalrous soldier than the man whose widow tonight asks at our hands this pension of $24 a month.

Mr. Gwynne was one of the soldiers who fought from 1861 to 1865, and when the war was over he gave all the energies of his nature and all the aspirations of his heart to build up the waste places and to restore real and genuine fraternal feeling between the different sections of this country. I hope sincerely in this case, and for the reasons so eloquently stated by my friend, the House will accede to the amendment offered by my colleague and allow the widow of this soldier $24 a month.

I fully sympathize with the point made by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions [Mr. MATSON], and if I thought it might be a precedent for thousands of other claims, as he seems to apprehend, I would not press it upon the attention of the House, but when it is such a distinguished case and so peculiarly meritorious, I do hope the committee will see the propriety of adopting the amendment submitted by my colleague.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make only one suggestion. After recognizing the valor that has been attributed to this soldier, which I do with great pleasure, giving it all the weight it should have in our deliberations here, I wish simply to make this suggestion, that out of the thousands and tens of thousands of soldiers who lost their lives and never returned to home or family or friends, and whose widows now get a pension, whether, when they have been valorous enough to give their lives to the country, it is judicious now to make an exception because of more conspicuous, not greater, but more conspicuous valor on the part of this soldier, whether we should tax the widows and orphans of those who lost their lives to increase this pension above what is received by those whose husband's lives were lost on the battlefield. That is all the suggestion I have to make.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I do not wish to be placed in the attitude I would ask a pension of $24 a month for this widow if it jeopardized the claim of any other widow in the United States entitled to a pension, or if it jeopardized the claim of any soldier who is entitled to a pension from this Government. I believe I would be doing injustice to the memory of my gallant comrade did I contend for anything of the kind on this floor. I present it simply as an exceptional case of a man no more brave perhaps than thousands and tens of thousands of men who marched to the front and gave the greatest evidence of devotion a man can give to his country, his life, no more, but still this case does rise above those in this one distinguished act of gallantry and bravery.

I might say, perhaps it would not be proper here, and I do not wish any discussion outside, that I hope yet to see the time when an American citizen will blush that any man who defended that flag in the hour of the country's danger is an inmate of an almshouse in any part of the country.

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, there certainly is no member of this committee who will go further in voting pensions than I will, and I would willingly to-night vote for a bill granting a pension to the widow of every soldier of this country at the rate of $24 a month. I would go further, sir, and vote to pension every man who served his country faithfully in the Army and the widow of every soldier of the country who died either on the battlefield or from the effects of wounds or of the war. I would pension the widows of such soldiers, whether the death of the soldier resulted from the effects of wounds or not. But to take out one exceptional case, the case here of the widow of one soldier who did one brave act, and make that a subject for Congressional generosity, when there are thousands of others just as much entitled to the increase, I do not think would be fair. I do not think it is right. There are thousands of men in the country to-day who are disabled by the war and unable to secure a pension at all upon some mere technicality of the pension law. There are hundreds of widows of soldiers to-day who are unable to secure a pension because they can not prove that their husbands died from the effects of wounds received or of disease contracted while in the service—thousands of them.

This is one of those cases where the widow was unable to obtain the pension through the Department because her proof failed to comply with the technical requirements of the law, by showing that he died from the effects of wounds. She comes here now asking a pension at the hands of this Congress.

That pension I am willing to grant; but to go beyond that and give a pension of $24 a month, when other widows are getting but $8, as the law now stands, is not right or fair to them. I am always willing to acknowledge and reward brave acts, but this is merely one of many. There are many soldiers who have done as brave or even braver acts than that, not only by risking their lives to rescue a flag from the enemy, but who have risked their lives and been wounded on perilous expeditions where their effort was to save a whole command, where a man risked his life and became wounded and maimed not to save a flag alone, but a regiment or a brigade, and where he threw his life into the breach to save the lives of his comrades.

I say such a man is as much entitled to honor as this man; and the principle that this amendment would involve is not a correct one. I have been opposed and am now opposed to making a distinction between the widows of soldiers of any rank. I have opposed that on this floor heretofore.

Mr. DOCKERY. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes, sir.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to ask the gentleman if it is not true that the Congress of the United States itself has recognized the exceptional character of this case and made it a very special exception by voting this soldier a medal for his distinguished valor?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. That may be very true. Congress may be willing to reward the heroic soldier for one heroic act by giving him a medal of honor as a distinguished mark for some peculiar act of bravery, but that distinction does not go to the extent of saying that there are not thousands of others who are just as much entitled to a medal as he. Men are soldiers, Mr. Chairman, because they love the Government. They enlist for the purpose of defending the flag they love; and to pick out the widow of one soldier and say to her that because your husband did one valorous act, one heroic deed, we will put you in a condition to live in ease and comfort, although you married this man after he got out of the service, after he was wounded, after he performed the act, while you did not have to endure any of the hardships this other poor woman did who sent her husband out in the beginning of the war, who was deprived of his association and care during the war, and he laid his life down upon the battlefield. We give that poor woman $8, while we give you $24. I say the principle is not right. It is a distinction between persons where there is no reason or excuse for it. One man went to risk his life and save his country just as well as the other did.

Mr. McKENNA. Will the gentleman from Indiana permit a suggestion?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. McKENNA. Let me draw the attention of the gentleman from Indiana to the circumstances surrounding this case. Does he not know from the description of the service of this soldier that he served in the war from 1861 to the end of it; and no doubt exists that he performed the act of gallantry of which the gentleman on my right [Mr. WARNER, of Missouri] has spoken? The widows of other soldiers are entitled to pensions, but the soldier in this case performed this conspicuous act of gallantry, which his other comrades did not dare to do, and put himself within the range of every rifle in the hands of the enemies who were in view of him. He risked every danger. Does not that make him conspicuous in his gallantry? Does not that make a distinction in his favor, and place him upon a different footing, and that he should be rewarded and his widow should be pensioned accordingly?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Now, I will play the "Yankee" with the gentleman, and answer his question by asking another.

Mr. LOUTTIT. Do not attempt to play the Yankee with a Californian, for you will get beat every time. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. If he performed this service before he was married to this woman and while a mere boy, for she afterward married him, and the Government pensioned him at $24 a month, what right does she now have to come here and get a higher pension than the widows of other soldiers who gave their husbands' lives for their country?

Mr. McKENNA. Let me suggest that the gentlemen who have opposed this proposition all have said this was a meritorious case and the lady deserved the pension, but they object to it because they say some other lady who has not got it deserves it equally well. I suggest that when that other lady comes possessing the like merit we can then extend to her the like reward.

Mr. LOUTTIT. That is California. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. The gentleman from California does not state my proposition correctly. I do not say that this lady is entitled to any more than anybody else. I am not putting it on the ground that somebody else will come up and ask a like pension. But I say if a man is ordered to march up to the cannon's mouth, and he does it in obedience to the order of the commanding officer and there stands till he is shot down, he is entitled to as much credit as the man who voluntarily runs into danger when not ordered.

There is many a man who has done a conspicuous and foolish act for which he has no right to be rewarded. I do not say this is one of them. But the man is to be rewarded who does his duty in the face of danger, and one man who stands up in the face of danger and risks his life is as much entitled to reward as another who does so.

Mr. McKENNA. Does not that obliterate all the distinctions of the pension law, and would it not give the soldier's widow as much as the general's widow?

Mr. JOHNSTON, of Indiana. Yes, sir; and you are now coming right back to my proposition. I say the widow of the private soldier should have as much as the widow of the man who commanded his regiment. I say there should be no distinction. That is my proposition, that it is unfair to make these distinctions; and if there is precedent for it, it is time we were stopping it and treating alike all men who served their Government from the same patriotic motives, and treating alike their widows and their children, not making an aristocracy of the one and leaving the others to labor. We should treat them all alike with our pension laws and treat them so that the private soldier with the musket upon his shoulder and the knapsack upon his back will feel his Government honors him, and will stand by him the same as it stands by the man that is higher in rank. The knowledge that the Government will do that will make good citizens, good patriots, men willing to lay down their lives for their Government when they know that the Government feels that the man who treads the humble path of life is as good as the man who happens to have had rank thrown around him.

Mr. LOUTTIT. On this bill I have simply this to say. It is reported by a member of the Committee on Invalid Pensions whose reports are creditable to him; and the way in which they have been treated by this House and the Committee of the Whole of this House show that he is regarded as the equal of any member of that committee.

This is a report that is presented by Major MORRILL, of Kansas. If there be any mistake that that gallant man makes in his reports to this House it is the mistake of erring on the safe side, on the side of economy. This report as presented by the gentleman from Kansas does not, I think, do to the soldier, or the widow of the soldier, whom it is intended to benefit, the full justice to which she is entitled. I say that the soldier who took all the risks of the war, who went forth with his command, who was found ever in the front, who faced every phase of danger that it was possible for a soldier to find himself confronted with, and who in addition to that went forth beyond and in front of his command and rescued from capture the colors of his regiment or his company, valued as its standard of honor, is entitled to a little distinction above one that simply stood in the ranks.

So far as I am concerned I make no question that the widows of those who have given their lives or have periled their lives in behalf of their country should be placed upon the same footing. But I say do not give the higher rank the lower price, but let us raise them to the same limit.

I remember a few evenings ago hearing the distinguished gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSTON] who has just preceded me say that so far as he was concerned—and I understand he was a commissioned officer in the Army—that between him and the private soldier he recognized no distinction. I will say to the gentleman that the law recognizes a distinction—the Government recognizes it. It recognizes it in the pay and the certificate and the check it paid to the honorable gentleman and the check and the pay it gave to the man who wore the blue without a strap or insignia that showed a rank beyond that of the private, but who waked at the call of the same bugle and marched at the same tap of the drum as he did.

As a member of this Congress who comes from a State so far from here that the echo of war was scarcely heard within its borders, and that to-day receives less than any other State of the Union under the pension law, I wish to say she does not take a back seat behind any of the thirty-eight States in raising her voice on behalf of the widows of those who fell in the glorious cause. I say that we desire justice to be done to the widows of our brave soldiers, and are willing to recognize bravery wherever it may have been shown.

As a member of the California delegation I most heartily second the remarks of my colleague [Mr. MCKENNA] and ask that the amendment be agreed to and that this bill be passed, so that this distinguished soldier, distinguished for his bravery, wounded in the arm, carried back to his command, but carried with the other arm and hand clasping the flag of his country, shall receive from this Congress recognition equal to that which he received from the one that sat here before and voted to him a medal such as has been voted to few, and so that his widow may be able to say, In his life he was honored, and in his death the Republic has proved itself not ungrateful.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I am very much interested in the adoption of the amendment proposed by my colleague from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], but I do not desire to occupy further time in the discussion of it, as there are other cases on the Calendar that are awaiting consideration. I therefore ask for a vote on the amendment, and I hope that it will prevail.

A MEMBER. Let the amendment be read.

The amendment was again read, as follows:

Strike out the words "subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws" and insert the words "and that she be paid a pension of $24 a month during her natural life, so long as she remains the widow of Nathaniel McLean Gwynne."

The House divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 11; so the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NEECE. I do not think we can afford to let this bill pass in that form. We ought to treat all the widows alike.

Mr. MATSON. Wait until it comes into the House.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

FANNIE E. EVANS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4426) for the relief of Fannie E. Evans.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll the name of Fannie E. Evans, widow of George S. Evans, late colonel of the Second Regiment California Cavalry, and pay her a pension of $30 per month, commencing September 17, 1883, with such increase per month for her children as provided for by the general pension law, subject to the provisions and limitations prescribed thereby.

The report (by Mr. LOUTTIT) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4426) for the relief of Fannie E. Evans, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to submit the following report:

The soldier in this case, George S. Evans, served during the Mexican war in Ben. McCollough's company, participating in the battle of Monterey and minor engagements under General Taylor, and was discharged at the close of the war. He entered the Union service during the late war, with the rank of major in the Second California Cavalry, on the 16th of October, 1861. He was promoted to lieutenant-colonel on December 1, 1861, and to colonel February 1, 1863, and brevetted brigadier-general for meritorious services.

In May, 1864, he was appointed adjutant-general of the State of California, which position he held for nearly four years. He was absent on a scouting expedition in 1862, and in command of the expedition to Owens Lake in July and August, 1862, and was in the various Indian engagements at the Spanish Fort and other places. During the spring of 1863 he tendered his resignation, and it was accepted on the 23d of April, 1863. In his General Order No. 14, dated at Camp Douglas, Utah Territory, May 31, 1863, he alleges as the cause of his resignation serious physical injuries induced by exposures of nearly two years of military life, constantly in the service, on the march, or in the field, which had to a certain extent invalidated his performance of further military duty.

Dr. Robert K. Reid testifies under oath that he was a surgeon during the late war, and that during the battles at Spanish Fort, Utah Territory, General Evans incurred a double hernia, incapacitating him for further performance of his duties and necessitating his resignation.

Dr. I. S. Titus in a letter to Dr. Reid, dated January 29, 1884, states that he attended the soldier at intervals during the last twelve years of his life, and can account for many of the symptoms, which were hard to diagnose during his life. Is satisfied that much of the sciatic pains of which he complained was incident to unusual pressure of his truss necessary to keep the hernia reduced, and binding him fast across the abdomen, always preventing him from any physical exertion or labor. This, connected with his tendency to obesity, kept up a certain stasis of circulation to a tendency of determination of the blood to the brain, which was an immediate factor in inducing his attack of cerebral apoplexy, from which his death resulted.

This claim was rejected by the Pension Office on November 17, 1884, upon the ground that there was no connection as to cause and effect between the hernia incurred by General Evans in the service and the cerebral apoplexy of which he died. It is, however, shown in the papers in the case, the most important of which are cited as above, that General Evans did contract an incurable disability while in the service, and taking for granted that the physician who testifies to his death and who is of an unimpeachable character properly diagnosed this case, and believing, as your committee do, that the statements that the soldier died of celebral apoplexy, superinduced by the effects of hernia are true, your committee are clearly of opinion that the meritorious services of General Evans during two wars merit some recognition from his country, and it is therefore recommended that the bill do pass after amending same by striking out all after word "cavalry," in line 6, and inserting the words "subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

MRS. MARY A. RIPLEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5127) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary A. Ripley.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, directed to place the name of Mary A. Ripley, a nurse in the war of the rebellion, on the pension-roll of the United States, and to pay her a pension of $12 per month during the remainder of her life: Provided, That said pension shall begin from the date of the passage of this act.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5127) granting a pension to Mrs. Mary A. Ripley, submit the following report:

That Mary A. Ripley was a voluntary nurse in the Army of Potomac during the war of the rebellion is shown conclusively by the numerous original passes among the papers in her case.

She avers in her petition, which is sworn to, that she became a nurse upon the personal request of President Lincoln and Surgeon-General Barnes. The following are extracts from letters of indorsement among her papers.

Lieut. John J. Gosper, secretary of Arizona Territory, speaks of her in the following commendatory and earnest language:

"I have been acquainted with Mrs. Mary A. Ripley since the commencement of the late war, and am conversant with the fact of her having given both time and money freely for the comfort of the sick and suffering in the hospitals. Knowing of her excellent service in that capacity in these trying times, and knowing further that she is in great need of the small amount justly her due from the United States, I most earnestly advocate the passage of an act looking to the relief of this deserving and worthy lady."

John S. Poler, formerly receiving and distributing agent New York Soldiers' Relief Association, says:

"It affords me satisfaction to state that with the sick and helpless Mrs. R. was always praised for her uniform kindness and attention. Among the many hospitals where I have met with Mrs. Ripley in the discharge of the above-named duties, I may name Falls Church, Fredericksburg, Alexandria, Georgetown, and several in and about this city. I have no hesitation in saying that I believe her services were of great value to the country at the time when faithful attendants were not plenty."

General Rufus Ingalls, says:

"Mrs. Ripley is one of those ladies who sacrificed much of personal comfort and means during the war in caring for our sick and wounded soldiers. I personally know of her humane efforts, and that they were of an importance entitling her to some recognition now on the part of the Government."

Maj. Albert M. Edwards, Twenty-fourth Michigan Volunteers, says:

"I take great pleasure in recommending Mrs. Dr. Ripley, of Alexandria, Va., to the kind attention of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the Potomac. Mrs. Ripley has visited this regiment several times during the past winter as an independent agent of the Sanitary Commission. She has brought with her sanitary supplies for the sick, and with her tender hand and kind words of cheer has soothed and encouraged the suffering soldier."

In view of the foregoing and the additional facts that this person is now advanced in age, and in restricted pecuniary circumstances, your committee are of opinion that she should be granted the pension she asks for, and therefore recommend the passage of the accompanying bill, with the following amendment: In line 6 of the bill strike out the word "twenty-five" and insert the word "twelve."

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

There being no objection, the bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LOUISA WEITZEL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2601) to increase the pension of Louisa Weitzel, widow of Godfrey Weitzel, late a major-general of volunteers.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the pension of Louisa Weitzel, widow of Godfrey Weitzell, late a lieutenant-colonel in the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, and a major-general of United States volunteers, be, and the same is hereby, increased to $50 per month.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3601) to increase the pension of Louisa Weitzel, widow of Godfrey Weitzel, late a major-general of United States Volunteers, respectfully report:

He was graduated from the Military Academy and promoted to the grade of brevet second lieutenant in the Corps of Engineers July 1, 1855.

He served as assistant engineer in the construction of the defenses of New Orleans, La., from 1855 to 1859, and as assistant professor of engineering at the United States Military Academy from September, 1859, to January, 1861.

During the war of the rebellion he served in the engineer company at Washington, D. C., January to April, 1861, and in the defense of Fort Pickens, Florida, April to September, 1861, as chief engineer on the staff of Brigadier-General Mitchell, constructing fortifications for the defense of Cincinnati, Ohio, October to December, 1861; in command of company of sappers and miners in defense of Washington, D. C., December, 1861, to February, 1862, and as chief engineer on the staff of Major-General Butler (Department of the Gulf) February to August, 1862, being engaged in the attack and capture of New Orleans April 20, 1862, and its subsequent defense, May to September, 1862; promoted to the rank of brigadier-general of volunteers August 29, 1862.

General Weitzel was in command of the force in the Lafourche campaign, October, 1862, to April, 1863, being engaged in the action of Labadieville, October 27, 1862; the destruction of the rebel gunboat Cotton January 14, 1863, and in several skirmishes; he was in command of the advance in Major-General Banks's operations in Western Louisiana April to May, 1863, being engaged in the combat at Camp Bisland April 13-14, 1863, and pursuit of the enemy with several skirmishes April, 1863; in command of a division at the siege of Port Hudson May 27 to July 8, 1863, participating in the assaults of May 27 and June 14, 1863; in command of a division of the Nineteenth Army Corps in the Lafourche campaign July, 1863; on the expedition to Sabine Pass, Texas, September, 1863, and in the Western Louisiana campaign September to December, 1863.

During the operations before Richmond, Va., he was in command of the Second Division of the Eighteenth Army Corps, May 2-29, 1864, and chief engineer of the Army of the James, May 20 to September 30, 1864, being engaged in the action at Swift's Creek, May 9, 1864; skirmishes and combats near Drury's Bluff May 14-16, 1864, and in constructing the defenses of Bermuda Hundred, James River, and Deep Bottom.

He was in command of the Eighteenth Army Corps (Army of the James) September 30 to December 3, 1864, being engaged in the repulse of the assault upon Fort Harrison September 30, 1864, and the assault of the enemy's lines on the Williamsburg and Nine Mile roads October 30, 1864.

Promoted to the rank of major-general of volunteers November 17, 1864, he served in command of the Twenty-fifth Army Corps December 3, 1864, to February 4, 1865; as second in command on the first expedition to Fort Fisher December 7–29, 1864; in command of all troops north of the Appomattox River during the final operations against the army under General Lee, March and April, 1865, he having taken possession of Richmond April 3, 1865. From April, 1865, to February 4, 1866, he was in command of the District of the Rio Grande, Texas.

Since the close of the war General Weitzel has served as superintending engineer of the construction of Forts Knox and Popham, Maine, 1866; of the survey and improvement of the Falls of the Ohio River, August, 1867, to July, 1882; of the survey and improvement of the Tennessee River, August, 1867, to May, 1871; of the improvement of the Ohio River, July to September, 1869; of the survey and improvement of the Cumberland and Wabash Rivers, July, 1870, to April, 1873; of the survey of the French Broad River, July, 1870, to May, 1871; of the eleventh light-house district May, 1873, to May, 1878, and October, 1878, to July, 1882; of the construction of the Saint Mary's Falls Canal and of various surveys and improvements of rivers and harbors in Eastern Michigan from May, 1873, to April, 1878, and October, 1878, to July, 1882; of the management and repairs of the Louisville and Portland Canal, June, 1874, to July, 1882; of various surveys and improvements of rivers and harbors in Eastern Pennsylvania, Delaware, and New Jersey, and of the defenses in Delaware Bay and River, from August, 1882, until the day of his death.

From June, 1870, until December, 1883, General Weitzel was a member of many important boards of engineers upon the improvements of harbors and rivers, the location and construction of locks, canals, and movable dams, and the plans and locations of bridges. He was a member of the commission to devise protection for the wharves at New Orleans against the encroachments of the Mississippi River in 1878, and chairman of the commission advisory to the board of harbor commissioners of Philadelphia, Pa., from August, 1882, until his death.

General Weitzel was promoted successively from the grade of lieutenant to that of lieutenant-colonel, Corps of Engineers, and major-general of volunteers.

He received the brevets of major, United States Army, "for gallant and meritorious services in the battle of Thibodeaux, La.," October 27, 1862; lieutenant-colonel "for gallant and meritorious services in the capture of Port Hudson, La.," July 8, 1863; colonel "for gallant and meritorious services in the capture of Fort Harrison, Virginia," September 29, 1864; brigadier-general "for gallant and meritorious services in the campaign terminating with the surrender of the insurgent army under General Robert E. Lee," March 13, 1865; major-general "for gallant and meritorious services in the field during the war," March 13, 1865, and major-general of volunteers "for meritorious and distinguished services during the war," August 26, 1864.

General Weitzel died at Philadelphia, Pa., May 19, 1884, and left his widow and young children unprovided for in life.

In consideration of these facts and of the distinguished services of General Weitzel during the war and since then, we recommend the passage of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LOUISA J. M'FARLAND.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1940) granting a pension to Louisa J. McFarland.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Louisa J. McFarland, of Richland County, Ohio, widow of Allen McFarland, late of Company E, One hundred and twenty-eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteers.

The report (by Mr. ELLSBERRY) is as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 1940) for the relief of Louisa J. McFarland, having considered the same and accompanying papers, submit the following report:

Allen McFarland, the husband of claimant, enlisted in the military service of the United States, and was enrolled December 17, 1863, as a private in Company E, One hundred and twenty-eighth Ohio Infantry, and served until duly discharged, July 13, 1865.

He filed an application for pension January 21, 1878, and was subsequently granted a pension, commencing from that date.

The basis of his claim for pension, as set forth in his declaration, was that while firing a heavy salute at Johnson's Island, Ohio, April 15, 1865, he contracted deafness of left ear and partial deafness of right ear.

Allen McFarland, the soldier, died May 18, 1881, and claimant filed her claim for pension, as his widow, February 20, 1882.

J. W. Craig, M. D., and M. P. Mason, M. D., of Mansfield, Ohio, testify to their knowledge of Allen McFarland, and the cause of his death.

Dr. Mason says:

"He treated him at different times in 1879, and until his death, and that he was mentally weak, and that he suffered from dullness and dizziness of his head; was very irritable and exacting, and at times would become offended at the most trifling matter and become very violent; that he noticed this peculiarity the first time he met him, and that he grew worse all the time, and the injuries caused mental derangement, which resulted in his death."

Dr. Craig, in his testimony, says:

"That he was acquainted with Allen McFarland from the 27th of March, 1879, until his death; that when he first knew him he found him dull of hearing, troubled with dizziness and fullness of his head; that he was mentally irritable, and that he continued to grow worse till his death. At times he was very violent, and would lose control of himself; noticed this peculiarity the first time I met him, and that he grew worse all the time, and that he regarded his injuries as the cause of his mental aberration which resulted in his death. I was present at the examination after his death and found arsenic in his stomach."

The application of claimant for pension was rejected June 22, 1885, on the ground that the death of the husband was not due to the service.

It is clearly established in this case that the mental condition of plaintiff, which terminated in insanity and death, was caused by the injuries received in the service and in the line of duty, and to deny his surviving widow a pension would do her great injustice; and therefore your committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. MCMILLIN having resumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. HATCH, from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, reported that they had had under consideration, pursuant to order, sundry bills on the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report the same to the House with various recommendations.

PENSION BILLS PASSED.

Bills of the following titles, reported without amendment from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 4112) granting a pension to Lizzie Kenamore;
A bill (H. R. 1634) for the relief of Margaret A. Caswell;
A bill (H. R. 1635) for the relief of Sarah B. Jackson;
A bill (H. R. 1943) granting a pension to James L. McClarran;
A bill (H. R. 2159) for the relief of D. P. Simmons;
A bill (H. R. 443) granting a pension to Susan Woolley;
A bill (H. R. 556) granting a pension to Bridget Sherlock;
A bill (H. R. 533) for the relief of Thomas Ferguson;
A bill (H. R. 3326) granting a pension to Thomas Simpson;
A bill (H. R. 2197) granting a pension to Fidelia A. Cheney;
A bill (H. R. 1988) granting a pension to Peter F. Saeman;
A bill (H. R. 4103) granting a pension to M. S. Clay;
A bill (H. R. 1398) granting a pension to Silas S. White;
A bill (H. R. 3601) to increase the pension of Louisa Weitzel, widow of Godfrey Weitzel, late a major-general of United States Volunteers; and A bill (H. R. 1940) granting a pension to Louisa J. McFarland.

Amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar to bills of the following titles were severally agreed to, and the bills as amended ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. 424) to amend the record of Giles C. Hawley and to place his name on the pension-roll;
A bill (H. R. 4224) for the relief of Amanda Rodgers;
A bill (H. R. 1840) granting a pension to Samuel F. Garnett;
A bill (H. R. 464) granting a pension to Robert McAlexander;
A bill (H. R. 2689) granting a pension to Delilah Knill;
A bill (H. R. 4976) for the relief of Tobias M. Coon;
A bill (H. R. 2753) for the relief of John W. Robson;
A bill (H. R. 2196) granting a pension to Sarah A. Gettis;
A bill (H. R. 1100) granting a pension to Jane Devereux;
A bill (H. R. 4538) granting a pension to Mary Ann Murphy;
A bill (H. R. 1113) granting a pension to Walter S. Haynes;
A bill (H. R. 4116) increasing the pension of John P. Brinegar;
A bill (H. R. 4918) granting a pension to J. Francis Hopper; and A bill (H. R. 4426) granting a pension to Fannie E. Evans.

CUDBERT STONE.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with amendments was the bill (H. R. 927) granting a pension to Cudberth Stone.

The amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole House, striking out "Cudberth" and inserting "Cudbert," was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I think the phraseology of this bill should be changed. It provides for granting a pension "according to existing laws;" and under that language, if the law should be changed, the pensioner possibly would not get the benefit of it. I suggest an amendment making the language conform to the usual phraseology—"subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas will be adopted.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

NIRA D. GWYNNE.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar with amendments was the bill (H. R. 1361) giving a pension to Niva D. Gwynne.

The amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole were read, as follows:

Strike out "Niva," in line 4, and insert "Nira," and strike out "subject to the conditions and limitations of the pension laws" and insert "and that she be paid a pension of $24 per month during her natural life so long as she remains the widow of Nathaniel McLean Gwynne."

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendments, there were—ayes 11, noes 10.

Mr. MATSON and Mr. WINANS. No quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point is made that no quorum has voted.

Mr. MCKENNA. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire what is the general rule regulating these meetings on Friday nights?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. They are regulated by the rules of the House like other meetings, the only limitation being that business is confined to pension bills and bills removing political disabilities. The House, however, is governed by the same rules and practice as during ordinary sessions. The point being made that no quorum has voted, the Chair orders tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER].

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 11, noes 9.

Mr. WHITE, of Minnesota. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, we do not desire to be factious or to delay the business of the House, but we insist that in this and other matters the majority of those present ought to govern.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, I have no feeling about this matter. I know none of these parties. According to all the evidence, both that given on the floor of the House and that by private testimony, this soldier did his duty nobly. I have no disposition to detract from his merits, or to do anything unkind toward any one related to him. But to adopt the amendment now pending would establish a precedent which we can not afford to establish; that widows shall be pensioned at rates in accordance with the heroic conduct of their husbands. That rule we can not follow and do anything like justice. If we establish such a rule by the passage of this bill, there will be hundreds of cases in which persons of all ranks will come here and insist that because their husbands did some conspicuous act of gallantry the widows' pensions should be increased.

For what is widow's pension granted? Is it for the degree of disability suffered by her husband? No. Is it because of the heroism displayed by him as a soldier? No. It is based upon the simple fact of the loss of her husband and her claim upon the Government in her dependent condition. That is all there is of it. For this reason the law makes no distinction on account of the nature of the services rendered by the soldier. Are we now to overturn this well-established principle?

Somebody has suggested this evening that there is no system in our laws with relation to pensions. I admit there is a want of system; but there is some little system left. Do you wish to destroy what little remains, and enter upon a policy of pensioning persons according to a rule which can not possibly be administered in such a way or to do justice? Congress in granting pensions to widows can not measure the value of the services of the husband, and say that one widow shall be pensioned at $8 a month, another at $16, another at $24, and so on all the way through the line to $100 or perhaps $1,000 a month.

It can not be done. It is utterly impossible. It is striking, as I have already suggested, at the very foundation of the whole pension system. Yes, what little of it may be left, as is suggested to me. This appears therefore, Mr. Speaker, to us to be a very serious matter, although these gentlemen say this is an exceptional case. That point is always urged for everything that is tried here, that it is an exceptional case. It may be said there is no other like it. That may be true. There are no two things exactly alike.

It is asked in the case of Mrs. Mitchell whose husband was a major, or of some rank below that of a general officer; it is insisted that her pension should be increased to $50 a month. We ask on our part such proposition shall be voted on in a full House. In this case also we ask this bill shall go over and be voted on in a full House. That is all we ask. If a quorum of the House sees fit to establish it as a precedent—if this House, after hearing the question fully discussed, shall consent to what has been proposed, very well. But I do protest against the few members who are now present undertaking to establish a precedent so grave that it must necessarily bring us, if adopted, into great trouble hereafter.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let me ask the honorable chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions whose fault it is that a quorum of the members is not present at this time?

Mr. MATSON. It is certainly not the fault of those who are here to-night. Now, Mr. Chairman, I think it is our duty before we enter upon so grave a thing as this is to have at least an expression of the opinion of a majority of a quorum. That is my idea. I do not think a few of us coming here moved by good impulse, as no doubt we all are—coming here with a recollection of the gallantry, heroism, and love of country exhibited by this man Gwynne, acting under good impulses, but not altogether guided by the cool, calm judgment of what the law of the land ought to be—whether the law which has stood so long shall now be changed in order that we may enter upon a scheme of granting pensions under which necessarily injustice must be done—I say before entering upon the establishment of such a grave precedent I do insist we shall have a vote by a quorum of the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. As I understand it this is merely a difference of opinion.

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. DOCKERY. Have we not in respect to other differences of opinion taken the action of the members who were present without calling for a quorum?

Mr. MATSON. Yes; we have. But in my judgment on matters of grave principle it is our duty to call for a quorum. I do not assume to be more responsible than any other member of the committee or of the House, but upon a question of grave principle unsettling a law so well fixed and so long established, it seems to me it is the duty of every member whose conviction is upon that side of the question to insist, before it is done, that it shall be done by a vote of a quorum of the House, and after such discussion that the country may know why the law so well established and so long enforced is to be revolutionized and changed.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana a question.

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman consider it a graver violation of the general principle of dispensing equality to grant this widow $25 a month than in the case or two which follows to grant widows $50 a month just because their husbands by good fortune had reached the position of major-general in the Army?

Mr. MATSON. If that had been an original question of granting $50 a month to a widow of a general officer in the Army I should have opposed it more vigorously than I am trying to oppose the precedent now sought to be established. But that is not an original question. Congress entered upon it a great many years ago before I ever thought of coming to Congress. It was adopted, and you can not refuse it now to the few remaining widows of general officers. You can not say to them their husbands were not as loyal as the husbands of those widows to whom it has already been granted. And that shows the danger of establishing this precedent because that has already grown into such a custom, notwithstanding we deem it unjust and wrong and ought not to have been entered upon, yet after one or two cases had been passed it has come to be granted without question. So it will be in relation to this matter if we pass this special act. If you establish this precedent by granting to this widow this pension of $24 a month on account of conspicuous gallantry, then you will have claimants of all ranks asking that their pension shall also be increased on account of the heroism of their husbands. You will thus establish a precedent that will continue to trouble you, and it will be impossible to do justice to anybody.

Are you going to stand here and discuss what battle this man was in, and what conspicuous service he rendered, when his widow comes and asks you for a pension? Whether he was brave in this battle or the reverse, are you going to establish that idea here? Upon legislation of a special character are you going into that sort of thing?

I think when this matter is well understood and deliberated upon this House will not be ready to do that. The only thing we can safely do is to adhere to the rule which has been so long established and so well observed.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I wish to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he is trying to be consistent, and yet while allowing a pension to go through of $50 a month to the widow of a major-general, he stands here and higgles over $24 a month in this single instance of the widow of a man who was conspicuous for valor in the battlefield.

Mr. MATSON. Now, Mr. Speaker, I want to answer the gentleman from Pennsylvania upon that proposition. If this was a proposition to pension this man it would be a different matter altogether from that presented now. But the pension in this case is to go to the widow who married him after the service was performed.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. But you do not make any distinction as far as the widows of major-generals are concerned.

Mr. McKENNA. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana a question?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. McKENNA. I understand the gentleman to say that we must not make any exception to the general laws. Now I will ask him is not every single one of these pension bills passed by Congress an exception in some manner or other to the general laws and because the general law will not pension the claimants, and is there any inconsistency in singling out examples of conspicuous gallantry and rewarding them accordingly?

Mr. MATSON. What the gentleman says is true in one sense of the word. All of this special legislation is as a matter of course to that extent exceptional, that is to say, those who come here are granted the favor of Congress when they can not get it in the ordinary channels. That is exceptional legislation, and it seems to me to be exception enough. You have already made an exception in the case of this widow by asking, which is not denied, the grant of a special pension in her case, because for some reason or other she can not obtain a pension through the Pension Office. Therefore you make an exception in her case by granting a pension at all. And yet she insists, or her friends do for her, that she should have still further exception, not because of anything she did—she is no more than the widow of any other soldier who was entitled to a pension—but because of an act of gallantry of the man she subsequently married.

Mr. McKENNA. Will the chairman of the committee yield for another question?

Mr. MATSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. McKENNA. Does not she receive a pension on account of the merit of her husband?

Mr. MATSON. She does not.

Mr. McKENNA. Upon what ground, then?

Mr. MATSON. On account of the death of her husband.

Mr. McKENNA. Then why is she given a pension on account of the death of her husband? If you died would your widow be entitled to a pension on account of your death?

Mr. MATSON. If I died from disease contracted in the service, or from wounds or injuries received in the line of duty while in the service, my widow would be entitled to a pension.

Mr. McKENNA. Then it was on account of merit or for what he had done in the Army by reason of services rendered to the country which entitled her to a pension?

Mr. MATSON. Not at all.

Mr. McKENNA. When she comes and asks for reward, shall we not give it according to the full merit of her husband?

Mr. MATSON. I would not be granted a pension, nor would my widow if I died, nor the widow of any soldier on account of mere service, but on account of my death and because of the fact that the death resulted from service—from wounds or injuries received in the service.

Mr. McKENNA. The service antedating the death.

Mr. MATSON. And this woman has been unable to show in the Pension Office that her husband's death did so result. She comes here and we give her a pension. We have made an exception to that extent, and I am perfectly willing to do it to that extent, but not further. I think there are circumstances which entitle her to a pension; but to go further and say that while we are granting it for the death of her husband, that because his death was exceptional or because his service was exceptional we will give her more than the thousands of others equally exceptional, I say we can not afford to do that. It has not been shown, even to the satisfaction of the Pension Office, that his death resulted from his service.

Mr. BRADY. Let me ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think the evidence before the committee establishes that fact?

Mr. MATSON. She ought to have the benefit of it, and we should extend our equitable powers that far and pension the widow. We ought to do it. But she is not entitled to a single cent more than the widows of the hundreds and thousands of brave men who stood in the ranks, who marched to the cannon's mouth and were shot down. Why should she be? The hundreds of thousands who lost their lives in battle required just as much nerve, just as much heroism to stand in the ranks and march to death, as myriads did—required just as much courage as this young fellow displayed, brave and generous as he was to do this conspicuous act.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let me ask the chairman of the committee why should Congress single out this man and confer a medal upon him?

Mr. MATSON. Because of one conspicuous act.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was a very extraordinary thing for Congress to do, I understand.

Mr. MATSON. I presume it was. I do not know of many instances of that kind.

Mr. McKENNA. That is all.

Mr. MATSON. I do not know of any instances of that kind. But there is no reason why his widow should receive more on that account. She is not pensioned for the gallantry, but for the disability.

Mr. McKENNA. I differ with you on that.

Mr. MATSON. Not even for his disability. She is pensioned for his death and nothing else. The law is based upon that, and now you seek to unsettle that idea.

Mr. DOCKERY. The distinguished chairman of the committee has spoken of the danger of establishing bad precedents. I want to say I have voted almost alone of the members from the Southern States for every pension proposition, whether of a general or a private nature. And if the fear is as to establishing a precedent, I want to say, hailing from that quarter and representing largely confederate soldiers, I am willing to establish the precedent and make it right here to pension liberally outside of the usual provisions of the law men that are singled out for conspicuous gallantry by the Congress of the United States and their widows when they are dead.

Mr. MATSON. I would be willing to pension men for their conspicuous conduct, but not their widows, because the widows are to be pensioned for the death of their husbands.

Mr. BRADY. I understand the gentleman to say he regarded this as a special case because the Congress had passed a resolution granting a medal for bravery to this man. I would ask, can there be any objection to granting pensions in cases of this nature? This is a peculiarly strong case.

Mr. MATSON. I think there is an objection as regards the widow, not as regards the soldier; because then you enter upon the idea of pensioning the widow not according to the disability of the soldier, not even according to any disability, but according to acts of heroism; and proceeding upon that idea you could not possibly weigh justly what the pension ought to be.

Mr. BRADY. But it is a pension granted on account of the services and the gallant and conspicuous conduct of the soldier.

Mr. MATSON. Not at all. There is no pension granted on that ground.

Mr. BRADY. I beg to differ with you.

Mr. MATSON. Not to a widow or soldier. The pension is for disability.

Mr. DOCKERY. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana if he knows the number of cases that would come under this category? Does he know the number of men that have been singled out by Congress to receive medals for conspicuous gallantry?

Mr. MATSON. I do not. I will say to the gentleman I do not remember of having heard of more than two or three cases like this—I mean cases of private soldiers.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then it would not be an expensive precedent.

Mr. MATSON. But if you start on this idea of granting pensions because Congress has singled a soldier out on account of acts of heroism, you will next find them quarreling among themselves as to who should be so distinguished.

Mr. BRADY. You will not have many such cases.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will remind the House that the tellers having reported the vote, and the absence of a quorum having been ascertained, nothing is now in order but a motion for a call of the House or a motion to adjourn. The Chair has allowed the discussion to proceed thus far to ascertain if any understanding could be arrived at.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I would be willing to withdraw it if there was any prospect of an amicable arrangement being made.

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. With the indulgence of the Chair and of the House, if there is no objection, I should like to say a word or two.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist on his motion? There is nothing in order but a motion to adjourn or a motion for a call of the House. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WARNER] rise?

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I rise desiring to make a very brief statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair begs to state that general discussion is not in order, and that a quorum not having voted, only one or the other of the two motions the Chair has indicated is in order.

Mr. MATSON. If the Chair will allow it I will be very glad to hear what the gentleman from Missouri has to say. I ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to proceed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania has moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what length of time?

Mr. WARNER, of Missouri. I shall not occupy more than two minutes. Mr. Speaker, I had thought that, the distinguished gentleman, the chairman of the committee, having been indulged so long in opposition to this case, a few moments at least by unanimous consent might be granted to the other side.

I am here, Mr. Speaker, to do what I can to secure a pension for every soldier's widow in this land. I am here to do what I can to secure a pension for every deserving soldier. I am here to do what I can to secure a pension for every soldier who fought in the Union Army, who to-day by reason of disease, poverty, or old age is incapable of earning a living, whether he incurred the disability in the line of duty or not. But, sir, believing that I am in the right, and having no fear of the precedent that will be set in this case, I am willing that the people of my State may know of the precedent that I have tried to establish here; and I am willing that it shall go out that upon this case a quorum has been called to defeat the will of the majority of this House.

I attribute no improper motives to any gentleman, because I apprehend and am willing to concede the gentleman from Indiana is liberal in his views and desires to do what is right. And, sir, I would rather this widow should receive simply this pension that is granted to her under the general law than that I should stand here to obstruct for one night a single case that is to follow? I am unwilling to stand here as an obstructionist to prevent legislation. I hope I may never occupy that position so long as I am a member of this House. And to permit these other cases to be acted upon promptly, as they should be, I am willing to withdraw this amendment, and after the pension shall be granted to this widow, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, I am willing then to meet the gentleman on the floor of the House, when there shall be a quorum present, and see whether or not the House thinks it proper to establish such a dangerous precedent as to give the widow of this heroic soldier the pitiful sum of $24 a month. Sir, I withdraw the amendment.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill giving a pension to Nira D. Gwynne."

MARY A. RIPLEY.

The next bill reported with amendments from the Committee of the Whole House was the bill (H. R. 5127) granting a pension to Mary A. Repley.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Mary A. Ripley."

ELLEN M. MITCHELL.

The next bill reported by the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 2022) to increase the pension of Ellen M. Mitchell.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection this bill goes over in accordance with the agreement entered into, to be considered when the House is full.

There was no objection.

RECONSIDERATION.

Mr. MATSON moved to reconsider the various votes by which bills had been passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MATSON. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WEBER: Petition for a life-saving station at Youngstown, Niagara County, New York—to the Committee on Commerce.

The following petitions, praying Congress to place the coinage of silver upon an equality with gold; that there be issued coin certificates of one, two, and five dollars, the same being made legal tender; that one and two dollar legal-tender notes be issued, and that the public debt be paid as rapidly as possible by applying for this purpose the idle surplus now in the Treasury, were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures:

By Mr. J. B. WEAVER: Of Samuel Sites and 165 others, of Kansas; and of James Steel and 75 others, of Indiana.

By Mr. HOWARD: Of citizens of Washington County, Indiana.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

SATURDAY, February 27, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. S. K. COX, of Washington.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the special order under which the House meets to-day.

The Clerk read as follows:

Ordered, That hereafter, until the further order of the House, there shall be a session of the House on each Saturday for general debate in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, no other business to be transacted.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for general debate.

A CORRECTION.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a correction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is some doubt as to the right of the House to-day, under the special order, to entertain any proposition whatever.

Mr. DOCKERY. I simply wish to correct the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection the Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. DOCKERY. In the debate last evening on the amendment to the bill to increase the pension of Nira D. Gwynne I am reported as saying that I have voted, almost alone of the members from the Southern States, for every pension proposition. That is incorrect. Neither in terms nor by implication, neither directly nor indirectly, did I refer to the vote of any other member, North or South. I may add that the delegation from my State, so far as I remember, have voted as a unit upon all pension propositions heretofore considered by the House.

Mr. BEACH. Now, Mr. Speaker, I renew my motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for general debate, Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for debate only, under the special order.

SILVER QUESTION.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, of all the powers of government, the two which affect most directly and potentially the prosperity and happiness of the great mass of citizens are the powers to impose taxes and to prescribe the character and volume of the currency of a country. In our country for the last quarter of a century these powers have been exercised—let us be charitable enough to suppose from the force of circumstances that could not be controlled, and not from choice—with special reference to the interests of a small class of citizens, the opulent, with little regard for the interests of the great middle and poorer classes of society.

Under the Constitution and the laws of Congress the General Government alone can furnish a currency for the business of the people, while Congress alone, under this Constitution, has the power "to coin money and regulate the value thereof;" and while it is expressly declared in the organic law that no State shall pass any law making anything but gold and silver a legal tender in the payment of debts, banks organized under charters granted by the States were formerly permitted to issue their notes redeemable in gold and silver, of which a sufficient amount for redemption purposes was required to be at all times kept in their vaults.

But in order to give the national banks a monopoly of the business of furnishing a currency for the country, Congress, not having the power under the Constitution to suppress or prohibit directly these issues, falling back on its powers to impose taxes to raise revenue for the support of the Government, imposed a prohibitory tax on them, and thus indirectly did that which it was unauthorized to do directly, and all paper currency, except only such as is issued directly by the Federal Government or indirectly under its authority by the national banks, was and has remained suppressed, and the national banks have had for nearly a quarter of a century the monopoly thus granted them.

To-day the currency of the country is composed of about eight hundred and ninety-three millions of gold and silver coin, three hundred and forty-six millions of legal-tender Treasury notes, and the notes of the national banks, amounting on the 1st of November to three hundred and fifteen millions, and now perhaps to less than three hundred millions. The total amount of money of all sorts in the country, gold, silver, and paper, is therefore only about fifteen hundred and forty millions. Of this amount seven hundred and twenty millions was, on the 1st of November, locked up in the vaults of the Government Treasury and the banks of the country, leaving in the hands of the people to pay all taxes, municipal, State, and Federal, and carry on the business of the country, only $788,000,000, an average of only about $13 per capita, an amount entirely inadequate to the transaction of the business of the country and the preservation of prosperity among the people.

To this undue contraction of the currency and the war of the bondholders on silver is due the universal paralysis of business and suffering among the people all over the country. In France, which is to-day of all European nations the most prosperous and in which as in our country one-half the entire population is engaged in agricultural pursuits, the average per capita is more than three times as much. When we remember in view of these facts that the average tax direct and indirect paid annually by every head of a family to the Federal Government alone, to say nothing of State, county, and municipal taxes, is $25 per capita per annum, we should not wonder that the fires have gone out in our furnaces, that the hum of our factories is hushed, that our farmers are in debt and their farms mortgaged to secure the payment of debts that are running at ruinous rates of interest.

This is the situation in our country to-day, because for a quarter of a century, almost a generation, all the financial legislation of the country has been in the interest of a favored few at the expense of the toiling millions of farmers, mechanics, and wage earners of the country. The national banker and the bondholder have been the especial pets of the Government, while the interests of the men who pay the taxes and fight the battles of the country have been subordinated to those of the favored few who fight no battles and pay no taxes. Our mechanics and artisans are idle half the time, and when employed are poorly paid, and our farmers and farm laborers not only find the product of their toil barely sufficient to support themselves and families, but they are burdened with taxes to pay interest to those who pay no taxes themselves.

I have no sympathy with those who for partisan purposes array the poor against the rich. I despise the demagogue who, by appeals to the prejudices and passions of the ignorant, incites labor strikes and encourages mob violence as a remedy for the real or imaginary wrongs of the laboring masses. I abhor any and every thing that tends to array class against class, and I disclaim in advance any desire to pander to the prejudices of any class of citizens; but it is the truth, a lamentable truth, that the American farmer is the hardest worked, the poorest paid, and the heaviest taxed man on the American continent.

Money is power, and aggregated capital is always able to take care of itself. Trades unions and co-operative associations of artisans and mechanics are organizations to protect their members. They fix their hours of work and the prices of their labor. Bankers and lawyers, merchants and manufacturers have their organizations for their own self-protection, and Congress and State Legislatures enact laws for their special benefit; but the hand of legislation has seldom been stretched out toward the farmers, who constitute nearly half of the entire population of this country, except to wring from their hard earnings exorbitant taxes to pay the expenses of the Government and subsidies and bounties to those who are more favored by the powers that be. Last year—a year of abundant harvests—closed upon nearly thirty millions of farmers who were poorer than when it opened.

And why? Because, as I have already said, all the legislation of Congress for the past quarter of a century has been in the interest of the national banker, the bondholder, and the millionaire, and no regard has been had to the interest of the agricultural classes. The excuse for all this is that when the Government found itself involved in one of the most desolating wars of modern times, to meet the expenses it issued about four hundred millions of its Treasury notes. Fearing that the currency would become too much inflated and urged on by those who had grown rich on the spoils of war and desired paying investments for their recently acquired wealth, it issued interest-bearing bonds and bought up nearly all of this four hundred millions of notes.

To supply the deficiency in circulating medium thus created and to interest capitalists in sustaining the credit of the Government the national-bank law was enacted, and under it the banks were allowed, upon the deposit in the Treasury of these interest-bearing bonds, to issue their own notes to the amount of 90 cents on the dollar of the face value of the bonds. They got the interest on the bonds deposited and also the interest on their own notes loaned to the people. For many years this operation was exceedingly lucrative to the banks. Many of the bonds deposited cost them only 50 cents on the dollar—some of them even less. All of the bonds of the Government were held by the banks or their allies, the private capitalists. The poor were unable to hold them.

Notwithstanding it was expressly provided in the law authorizing their issue that these bonds, which amounted to over $2,000,000,000 at the close of the war, were to be paid in greenbacks, the bondholders claimed that they had sustained the credit of the Government and were therefore entitled to special consideration, and that the bonds ought to be paid in coin, gold and silver. Accordingly Congress, on the 18th of March, 1869, passed "An act to strengthen the public credit," wherein it was provided that the bonds should be paid in coin.

Thus Congress yielded to the bondholder all that he demanded, agreed to pay him in coin, and thereby made his bond worth more than twice what it cost him. Under the terms of the refunding act of 1870 this contract that the bonds should be paid in coin—silver and gold—was renewed. It provided that they should be paid in coin of the standard value at that time—July 14, 1870—that is, in gold dollars containing 25.8 grains of standard gold, or silver dollars containing 412½ grains of standard silver. It does seem that the bondholders ought to have been satisfied with this generosity of the Government, but they were not.

No sooner had they succeeded in having the contract so changed as to secure the payment of their bonds in silver and gold instead of in greenbacks—the currency in which the soldier who risked his life on the field of carnage was paid and the farmer who supported the soldier was paid—than they began to connive with the holders of corporation bonds in this country and the bondholders in Europe to demonetize silver and again change the contract so as to be paid in gold alone, instead of silver or gold at the option of the Government.

In pursuance of this agreement they succeeded in having inserted in the Revised Statutes, by some means which has never yet been satisfactorily explained, a provision in these words:

> The silver coins of the United States shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

Thus surreptitiously depriving silver of its debt-paying power. This was done when the statutes were revised by a commission not authorized to add to nor take from them, but only to classify and re-arrange the laws as they already existed. This volume, with the unauthorized provision above quoted inserted, was adopted by Congress in 1874, and I hazard nothing in saying not ten men in either branch knew that the provision virtually demonetizing silver was in it.

The passage of the Bland act of 1878, in spite of the earnest and unceasing opposition of Wall street and the national banks and bondholders, restored to the old Hamilton dollar of 371¼ grains of pure silver its legal-tender quality to any amount. This was a partial remonetization of silver, but it did not go far enough, because its coinage was limited. It was only half a victory for the people over the bondholders. They were not conquered, but continued the war on silver, and, aided by a timid Secretary of the Treasury, they have succeeded in depreciating the price of silver bullion but not of the silver dollar, which does now and always will while the American eagle is stamped upon it buy as much food or clothing or any other commodity that the poor man wants as the gold dollar.

Many honest persons, alarmed at the prophecies of the gold-bugs of the direful consequences of the continued coinage of silver, have fallen into the error of supposing these prophets of evil to be sincere when they claim that to enlarge the volume of silver will drive gold from the country. But these honest but timid men have not investigated the question. It is a plausible theory, but will not work in practice. The experience of every nation proves the contrary to be true. These same gold-bugs in 1878, at the time of the passage of the Bland act, made the same prediction; but the facts as shown by the official reports of the Secretary of the Treasury and his subordinates prove that the reverse is true.

At the date of the passage of the resumption act, or rather the date at which it went into effect, January 1, 1879, the whole amount of gold in the United States was $278,000,000; and as the coinage of silver has gone on steadily every year at the rate of nearly thirty millions a year, the amount of gold has steadily increased year after year until on the 1st day of January, 1886, according to the official report of the Director of the Mint it was six hundred and twenty-six millions.

Germany, who tried the experiment of demonetizing silver under the most favorable circumstances under which it has ever been tried, met with the same or indeed a more striking experience. After the defeat of Napoleon at Sedan she imposed upon France, crushed and impoverished by the war, an indemnity of a thousand millions of gold and collected it. Bismarck, desirous of crushing her as completely financially as he had on the field of battle, and seeing the coffers of Germany filled to overflowing with gold, demonetized silver, the only metallic money left to France after she had paid all her gold to him as a war indemnity. Demonetize silver in Germany, he reasoned, throw all her immense supply on the market, and the value of French silver will be destroyed and her currency will be only irredeemable paper and her power as a commercial rival forever broken. He carried out his plan.

The silver of Germany was called in, demonetized, and sold to England in such quantities that in a few months the price of silver had fallen 20 per cent. in the London market. The German mints were worked to their utmost capacity coining French gold into German marks to supply the place of demonetized silver. No nation on the earth ever made the transition from bimetallism to monometallism under such favorable circumstances, and yet the result there after silver was demonetized was the same as here under the menace of its demonetization. German industries languished from one end of the empire to the other. Her factories were idle or run on short time. Tens of thousands of her people were idle and begging for work, and in a short time, in her effort to destroy France, she damaged her own prosperity more than the thousand millions she had wrung from her rival.

Impoverished France, on the other hand, with nothing left but her six hundred millions of despised silver, recovered from her defeat and exhibited a degree of elasticity unprecedented in the history of nations. Her silver, the money of the people, the money which sustains the retail trade and supports all the industries of every nation, was left. Her people were thereby kept busy, and her industries of every sort prospered. The demonetization of silver in England and Germany did not affect its value in France. Under such circumstances monometallic Germany, with coffers full of gold, languished, and to-day prosperity is a stranger to her borders. Her thousand millions of French gold, together with her entire home supply, has dwindled down to two hundred and forty millions, while France has her six hundred millions of silver with which she started and nine hundred millions of gold besides.

As Germany made the transition from bimetallism to monometallism under the most favorable circumstances any nation ever had for the experiment, so we now have the best opportunity for inaugurating a currency unsurpassed by any in the world to take the place of one inaugurated as a necessity to meet the temporary requirements of the Government under the stress of war. Already the national banks have contracted their circulation to the lowest limits possible to keep their places in the system because they can not afford to pay a premium of 24 per cent. for bonds on which to issue currency to the extent of only 90 per cent.

It is better for the capitalist who has a hundred thousand dollars of United States bonds to go into Wall street and sell them to a few for one hundred and twenty-four thousand in gold, as he can do, and go into private banking, than to deposit them in the Treasury and take out his ninety thousand of national bank-notes. The interest on the extra thirty-four thousand which he gets when he sells his bonds is almost or quite as much as the interest on his bonds bought at so high a premium. The contraction of the currency from this cause alone has been going on very rapidly, and for the last three years the volume of the paper circulation of the country has been reduced nearly $50,000,000. Had the Secretary of the Treasury continued to call and pay the 3 per cent. bonds the last year as he had for years before, he estimates that the contraction from that cause alone would have been for the year forty millions more.

These monthly calls of bonds have been resumed; thirty millions have been called within the last ninety days, and as a consequence the process of contraction is going on now at a rate much more rapid than ever before. When all the threes held by the banks as a basis of circulation, which amounted on the 1st of November to one hundred and thirty-nine millions, are called and paid off, national-bank circulation will be practically at an end. Because, as has already been said, the banks can not afford to take out currency on the fours and four-and-a-halfs, which command so high a premium. At that time, which is only a few months in the future, the national banks will cease to be banks of issue. They may and perhaps will be continued as banks of discount and deposit, but they can no longer be relied on to furnish a currency for the country.

For this purpose some other means must be devised. Two paths only are open to us, the issue of Treasury notes, such as we now have in limited quantity, based on the faith and credit of the Government and redeemable in coin to an amount sufficient with the specie in the country to supply the demands of trade, or the issue by the Government of coin certificates, payable not in gold nor in silver but in either, at the option of the Government, in exchange for all the gold and silver coin and bullion that may be brought to the Treasury. Each of these plans has its advocates. Either would supply the demand now so urgent for a currency to take the place of the national-bank bills so rapidly disappearing. Either would be a good currency and would always be at par with gold. The latter is perhaps preferable because its volume would always depend on the amount of gold and silver taken annually from the mines, and the experience of all governments has been that the increase of the volume of gold and silver, when used concurrently as a circulating medium, or the basis of a circulating medium, is so nearly in proportion to the natural increase of population that there is less danger of sudden and disastrous contractions and expansions in the volume of a currency based upon it than in a currency based on anything else.

Nature regulates the volume, and it can not be diminished nor increased by legislative enactment. All that legislation has to do is to fix the relative value of the two metals and provide for their free coinage at these rates, or the issue of a paper currency on it redeemable in either metal at the relative value so fixed by law. Nor does this demand any new legislation in this country. The relative value of gold and silver coin, as it has been fixed since the passage of the Mint act, of 412½ grains of standard silver to 25$\frac{8}{10}$ grains of standard gold, is according to the experience of civilized nations as nearly correct as it can be got. Indeed, the proportion of 16 grains of silver to 1 of gold is a little greater than in France and other European countries, where the proportion is 15½ to 1.

All this cry about the "dishonest dollar" and "fraud dollar" and "80-cent dollar" is for a purpose. When silver was demonetized and reduced to the condition of a commodity of course its bullion value went down in the same proportion as other commodities. Retain its legal-tender quality and restore the free coinage it had for seventy years, and it will quickly appreciate and reach a parity with gold. In the language of the unanswerable report of the minority of the Committeee on Coinage, "the decrease in the use of gold as a consequence of the increased use of silver will decrease the value of gold, and while silver rises gold will fall and the two will reach a parity midway."

The clamor for the demonetization of silver is not inspired by a real conviction that silver is cheap and unfit for a coin metal, nor by a fear that it will drive gold from the country, but by a selfish desire on the part of the holders of gold which is now hoarded, and the thousands of millions of national, State, and corporation bonds, who desire to strike down silver, one-half of the world's metallic money, and thereby increase the purchasing power of gold, the other half. This merciless effort on the part of the fortunate few who hold the gold and the interest-bearing debts of the governments and corporations of the world to double their own wealth at the expense of the great masses of the toiling millions is nothing new.

Professing to be alarmed at the unprecedented yield of the gold fields in California and Australia when the richness of these mines began to be realized, these same bondholders and bullionists demanded the demonetization of gold in order to enhance the value of their securities, and some of the nations of Europe, notably Germany, Holland, Belgium, and Portugal, did wholly or partially demonetize their gold, and Russia prohibited the exportation of silver lest if gold were demonetized she might be left without metallic money. We are now witnessing a repetition of the same effort to double the value of the money of the rich few by destroying the value of that of the millions of the poor. The only difference is that then the attack was made on gold by the opulent classes of some of the nations of Europe, and now it is made on silver by the same classes not only all over Europe but in America as well.

Then the attack was made on gold by a few nations with little or no concert of action; now it is made on silver with the most perfect concert of action, the object being in both cases to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. If Congress should make the great mistake of yielding to the demands of the monometallists it will be only a few years until the balance of trade, which has been largely in our favor, will turn against us and silver being no longer money our gold will rapidly go to pay our foreign debts and we will have no metallic money. Nor is this all. Our silver, being no longer valuable to us, will be sold in the markets of the world as bullion at whatever price the demand for it will command.

England, whose Indian Empire almost equals in extent the United States, with a variety of soil and climate adapted to the successful cultivation of all the products of the three zones, and teeming with a population of 250,000,000 of cheap laborers who work for 50 cents a week, and whose sole metallic money is silver, will buy our discarded silver at 60 per cent. of its coin value, send it to her Indian mints, and stamp it 100 cents on the dollar and buy all the wheat and cotton she wants for the consumption of her home empire. In eight years her imports of wheat from India have increased tenfold and now amounts to one-half as much as she buys from us, and at this rate it would be only a few years until there would be no market for American wheat in London, but Indian wheat made with Indian cheap labor at 50 cents a week will be offered in New York in competition with American wheat grown with American labor costing seven to ten times as much.

Already she is a formidable rival for America's cotton trade, and it is only a question of time when she will, with her cheap labor, drive all low-grade American cotton produced with American dear labor from the markets of the world. Strike down silver and these results will quickly follow: the products of the American wheat and cotton fields will be a drug on the markets of the world; our agricultural labor will be unemployed; our farms will grow up in weeds, or, worse still, will pass into the hands of those who already hold mortgages on them, and their present owners will be mere tenants or day laborers.

The great debtor class, which comprises, perhaps, three-fourths of our entire population, will find that it will require twice as many bushels of wheat or bales of cotton or days' work to pay their debts when gold alone is money as it did when they contracted them with gold and silver both money and a legal tender. To-day, twenty years after the close of the war, when more than half of the war debt has been paid, and after silver has been part of the time demonetized and another part half way remonetized, and when industries have been paralyzed by baneful financial legislation and the partially-successful and ever-threatening menace that it shall be entirely stricken down, it is a fact that practically the war debt is larger than it was when it reached its maximum nominal limit of $2,800,000,000.

Owing to the contraction of the currency, the hoarding of gold, and the unceasing effort to dishonor silver, it would require to-day to pay off the remaining fourteen hundred millions of the debt more cotton, or wheat, or iron, or labor, at the prices these commodities now command, than it would have required to pay the whole twenty-eight hundred millions at the close of the war, so great has been the shrinkage in the purchasing power and the debt-paying power of every commodity except gold. And yet the earnest, unceasing effort of the creditor class is to still further depress the price of property and labor and the products of labor, and render it still more difficult not only for the Government but for all its citizens who owe anything to pay it. Congress should not suffer this scheme of the bondholders to be consummated.

These debts as well as most of the corporation debts of the country were contracted with gold and silver and Treasury notes, all legal tender, and the law, as has been said, expressly provided that they should be paid in either. They knew this when they bought the bonds, for the act authorizing their payment in either silver or gold, at the option of the Government, is printed on each bond, so that no one could be deceived in the matter. When the bondholders first presented their preposterous claim to payment in gold alone the Congress of the United States, astonished at their audacity, passed, after exhaustive debate, a concurrent resolution—this was in the month of January, 1878—in these words:

Whereas by the act entitled "An act to strengthen the public credit," approved March 18, 1869, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver; and

Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in the said act of Congress, approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt;" and

Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit the 14th day of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled "An act supplementary to the act entitled 'An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,'" to be a legal tender of payment, according to their nominal value, for any sum whatever: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That all the bonds of the United States, issued, or authorized to be issued, under said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited, are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States, in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith, nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor.

To provide now, in the face of this explicit declaration of Congress, that they shall be paid in gold alone, as the bondholders demand and as has been the custom of the Secretary of the Treasury, is an outrage upon the people and should not be tolerated. The coinage of silver should be continued; indeed, it should be free as the coinage of gold is. All gold and silver bullion carried to the mints should be received and coined for the holder into standard gold and silver dollars of the weight and fineness now prescribed by law, or should be paid for at its true coin-value in coin certificates, redeemable at the option of the Government in either coin. The bonds should, as the law and the contract and good faith to the people demand, be paid in coin, either gold or silver, as the Government may elect.

Do this, Mr. Chairman. Cease to dishonor silver, but restore it to its position as a debt-paying metal assigned it by the fathers, which it held for seventy years side by side with gold, equal with gold, and prosperity will return to bless our country, agriculture will flourish, manufacturers will revive, and commerce will again enliven our marts of trade. The balance of trade will continue to be largely in our favor. Foreign gold will flow in in exchange for our surplus products and swell our coffers, and our people will be as they ought to be with the boundless resources at their command, the richest as well as the happiest people on the face of the earth.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to take advantage of the present opportunity for the purpose of submitting a few remarks upon a subject of great interest not only to the people of my State but to cattle-growers and beef consumers throughout the country. I had occasion in the last Congress to invite attention to the magnitude and importance of the stock-growing business of Texas and to show, among other things, that within its limits was to be found about one-seventh of all the cattle in the United States. Our stockmen have viewed with alarm the discriminations which have been put in operation affecting the success of this great industry. To-day we are almost deprived of market outlet for our cattle either by land or sea. Our ports are in shallows and our drivers and shippers are met with obstructions as soon as they attempt to transcend our State lines in the shape of restrictive if not absolutely prohibitory police and quarantine regulations and exorbitant inspection laws of other States and Territories, to which are superadded apprehended dangers of interference in transitu growing out of the provisions of the animal industry law.

A practical embargo is laid upon our commerce. We have no sufficient water transit, and we are afraid to ship by rail or drive our herds through the country. A condition known as splenetic fever is said to attend cattle driven from a lower to a higher latitude. This is perhaps no more peculiar to Texas cattle than those of other sections, but owing to our geographical situation and the extent of our transactions in and movement of cattle, it is more frequently termed "Texas cattle fever." It is estimated by scientists that ninety days after the removal of cattle from their accustomed range there is no danger of their communicating any infection to other cattle in consequence of this fever, and that they are wholly exempt from any liability to have it during the months from November to May, independent of migration. This splenetic fever furnishes the excuse for the enactment of laws unfriendly to Texas cattle interests and their attempted exclusion from market, as well as interference in the transportation from one State to another.

Mr. Chairman, a bill was introduced by me early in this session, and referred to the Committee on the Territories, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the bill (H. R. 2418), as follows:

To disapprove chapter 49 of the acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of diseased cattle into the Territory of New Mexico," approved March 19, 1884.

Be it enacted, &c., That the act of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico entitled "An act to prevent the introduction of diseased cattle into the Territory of New Mexico," approved March 19, 1884, be, and the same is hereby, disapproved.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, the act of the Territorial Assembly of New Mexico, to which this bill relates, from its title seems to be harmless and unobjectionable, but it is, nevertheless, in my judgment, violative of the Federal Constitution, detrimental to the interests of contiguous States and the country at large, and also to the well-being and development of the Territory of New Mexico itself. I have introduced, also, a similar bill, having for its object the disapproval of a kindred act of the Legislative Assembly of Arizona. It may be well, at the outset, to call attention to the language of this act of the Legislature of New Mexico. It provides:

SECTION 1. That it shall be unlawful for any person or corporation to drive or transport or cause or procure to be driven or transported into the Territory of New Mexico any cattle which are, or within twelve months prior to their introduction to this Territory have been, affected with or exposed to any contagious or infectious disease, or which within such period have been driven or transported from or through any district of country where such disease was known to exist at the time of such driving or transporting, or without the certificate of the inspector of cattle, as hereinafter provided, being first obtained.

SEC. 2. The governor shall appoint, at such convenient points as he may deem proper within the Territory, and as near as possible to the frontier, inspectors of cattle, whose duty it shall be to inspect all cattle destined for introduction into the Territory, and to ascertain whether any of such cattle are, or have been, infected with, or exposed to, any contagious or infectious disease, or have been driven or transported from or through any district of country where such disease was known to exist as mentioned in section 1 of this act; and for this purpose he may require affidavits of the persons in charge of such cattle as to all the facts connected with their driving or transporting.

SEC. 3. If upon such inspection and investigation such inspectors shall be satisfied that such cattle are free from contagious or infectious disease, and are otherwise proper to be admitted under the provisions of section 1 of this act, he shall give to the person in charge of such cattle a certificate to this effect, and if not so satisfied he shall refuse to give such certificate.

SEC. 4. The said inspectors shall hold their offices during the pleasure of the governor, and shall be entitled to receive $1 per head for all high grade or thoroughbred cattle inspected, and 20 cents per head for all other cattle inspected, not exceeding 1,000 head at one time, and for any excess above 1,000 in the same herd or lot 10 cents per head, and 10 cents per mile for the distance necessarily traveled in going from their usual place of abode to the place of inspection, such fees and mileage to be paid by the owner of the cattle before the delivery of the certificate of inspection; and in case a certificate is not given they may be recovered by the inspector from the owner in a civil action.

SEC. 5. For the purpose of taking the affidavits mentioned in section 2 of this act the inspector shall have power to administer oaths, and any person who shall swear falsely in such affidavit shall be deemed guilty of perjury.

SEC. 6. The provisions of this act shall apply to shippers and carriers as well as owners of cattle, and the certificate of the inspector shall not relieve them from liability, either criminal or civil, for the introduction of cattle contrary to the provisions of section 1 of this act.

SEC. 7. The inspector may appoint a deputy, who may act in his absence.

SEC. 8. Every person having in charge cattle destined for introduction into this Territory, whether as owner or carrier, or as agent of either, shall, at least ten days beforehand, notify the inspector nearest the proposed point of entrance to the Territory, of the time and place when and where such cattle will be ready for inspection, which place shall be beyond the boundary line of the Territory, and he shall hold the cattle at the place so designated until inspected.

SEC. 9. Any inspector who shall knowingly give a false certificate, or shall without good cause under this act refuse to give a certificate of inspection, or shall willfully delay in making inspection when notified, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall be liable to the injured party for damages arising from such refusal or delay.

SEC. 10. Any person or corporation who shall violate the provisions of section 1 of this act shall be punished by a fine of $5,000 for each offense, to be imposed by the court on conviction upon indictment or information, or to be recovered as a penalty by the Territory in a civil action; and shall also be liable for all damages resulting therefrom. Each lot or herd of cattle unlawfully brought into the Territory shall constitute a separate offense.

SEC. 11. This act shall take effect from and after its passage.

A subsequent act provides that the inspectors appointed shall be required to give a bond in the penal sum of $5,000, and that any person damaged by any improper or malicious action of such inspector may bring action therefor in the name of the Territory against such inspector and his sureties on his official bond, and recover thereon the amount of such damage not exceeding the penalty of said bond.

Mr. Chairman, it is clearly within the power of Congress to exercise supervision over Territorial legislation, and it is the duty of Congress to hold in check any unconstitutional procedure on the part of the Territories by asserting its veto power when a necessity arises, and hence the law provides (section 1850, Revised Statutes) that all laws passed by the Legislative Assembly and governor of any Territory (except in the Territories therein mentioned) shall be submitted to Congress, and if disapproved shall be null and of no effect.

The succeeding section provides that the legislative power of every Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States. There are numerous instances where Congress has asserted its prerogative in such cases. The act of July 1, 1836, passed at the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, disapproved and annulled certain acts of the Territorial Legislature of Florida creating banks and incorporating banking insurance companies. In the Thirty-ninth Congress certain former acts of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana were disapproved and declared null and void, and the same was done in the matter of legislation in the Territory of Washington at the second session of the Fortieth Congress.

The Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce among the several States." It further provides that "no State shall, without the consent of the Congress, lay any impost or duty on imports or exports, except what may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws; * * * and all such laws shall be subject to the revision and control of Congress."

I maintain that this act of the Territorial Legislature of New Mexico is in conflict with these constitutional provisions. It can not be claimed that the Legislature of New Mexico has the right to interfere with interstate commerce. It can not be claimed that it has the right under the Constitution to levy this exorbitant and extraordinary charge for inspection fees.

If New Mexico, under the pretense of preventing the introduction of diseased cattle, can enact a statute whereby any cattle which within twelve months may have been affected with or exposed to any infectious disease, or within such period may have been driven from or through any district where such disease was known to exist at the time of such driving, and lodge the execution of this law in the caprice or discretion of an unscientific inspector, who can determine in his own good pleasure the propriety of the issuance of a health certificate, it can set at defiance all veterinary science and sanitary laws, and just as well extend the period to three or five years. The prohibition would be but little more severe.

Suppose cattle were started from Kansas or Colorado or Texas in the spring or midsummer and were to arrive at the New Mexico line in December or January, when no splenetic fever could possibly exist (and that is what is meant, for no case of pleuro-pneumonia has ever been known in that region), is it not possible for the inspector, under this law, to say to the owner, "Your cattle had splenetic fever last spring or summer, or passed through a district where it existed, and even though without disease now it is not 'otherwise proper' for them to be admitted—I am not satisfied?" If the cattle are brought directly across the country from east to west, the same declaration may be made. If the owner of a herd has held his cattle for years within ten or twenty miles of the Territorial line, in the same climate and intermingling, as cattle will, at intervals with the New Mexican cattle, and being of the same grade and quality as those within the Territory, feeding on the same pasturage and subject to like conditions, an embargo is laid upon him should he choose to remove his stock within this favored region. If he drive from a higher to a lower latitude he is confronted with the same difficulties. If he be a resident of the Territory and buys cattle outside of its limits and attempts to take them into New Mexico, if the law be administered, he is subjected to the same embarrassments. It is not difficult in view of these conditions to perceive how commerce is restrained and injuriously affected, and that the introduction and transportation of healthful and merchantable cattle into and through the Territory may be entirely prevented.

A State has the power under the Constitution by implication, at least it is not enjoined from so doing, to lay an impost that may be absolutely necessary for executing its inspection laws, and even then is subject to the revision and control of Congress. If it be conceded that a Territory is invested with the same authority, it certainly has not the right to enact such a rigorous and oppressive law as the one herein complained of and levy such enormous duties as those contemplated in the inspection fees in the fourth section of the act which is sought to be annulled. Cattle perfectly healthful may be detained beyond the boundary line of the Territory for no telling how long to await the arrival and convenience of an inspector, who must be notified ten days in advance, and who is not even required to be a veterinary expert or conversant with grades of cattle, and if perchance they can run the gauntlet of his examination the owner is compelled to pay per head $1, 20 cents, or 10 cents, contingent upon the grade and number of cattle.

If he have five hundred high-grade cattle he must pay $500 to enter the Territory with them; if he have one thousand head of ordinary cattle he must submit to the imposition of a $200 tax; if he have five thousand head it will cost him $600 for the mere privilege of introducing his stock into New Mexico, independent of the mileage of the inspector, and outside of the expense and time lost in the detention of his herd and the deterioration of his stock in consequence of holding them upon an insufficient range, which last he is often wholly unable to do. This tax is imposed without regard to where the cattle come from, or when they are admitted. There is no exemption in the act as to the altitude from whence the cattle hail, the season of the year in which they are shipped or driven, or former sanitary considerations.

I know of one firm who paid $238 in November last for the privilege of taking two hundred and thirty-eight Hereford calves into Arizona from the Territory of Wyoming and State of Missouri. I believe it would not be an exaggeration to state that one hundred thousand head of cattle have been prevented from entering New Mexico from the State of Texas alone under the unjust operations of this act, and that more than twenty thousand head have been turned loose on the western border of Texas adjoining New Mexico since the 1st of last November, entailing vast loss and inconvenience to the owners, to which no official bond of an inspector could respond. Are such hardships as these, and many others that might be enumerated, "absolutely necessary for executing the inspection laws" of New Mexico? I earnestly invite the attention of the committee having this matter in charge, the Congress of the United States, and all fair-minded men to a careful and impartial investigation of this subject.

Mr. Chairman, the essential purpose of these acts is not confined to what appears in their titles. They have been enacted ostensibly to protect the herds of the two Territories from infection, while, in my opinion, their "true inwardness" involves the exclusion from the public lands of said Territories of all cattle not now upon them, and, while operating with general injustice, it is especially actuated by hostility to the State of Texas. In this connection I request attention to the following circular letter:

OFFICE OF SECRETARY,
CATTLE AND HORSE GROWERS' ASSOCIATION OF NEW MEXICO,
Las Vegas, N. Mex., January 18, 1886.

DEAR SIR: This association has just learned that Congressman LANHAM, of Texas, has introduced a bill into the House asking for a repeal of section 49 of the acts of the last Legislature of New Mexico, which section has reference to the law of quarantine as established by New Mexico to protect her stock interests from contagious animal diseases. Will you kindly call the attention of members of your association who have influence in Washington, and especially with ANTHONY JOSEPH, Delegate in Congress from this Territory, to the urgent necessity that exists to defeat said bill when it shall come before the House for action. New Mexico must not be made the quarantine ground for Texas cattle. Your prompt action in the matter may be the means of averting the deplorable consequences which would result to our stock interests by the raising of the quarantine restrictions.

The bill has been referred to the Committee on Territories, which is composed of the following-named Representatives: WILLIAM D. HILL, chairman, Ohio; WILLIAM SPRINGER, Illinois; A. JOSEPH, New Mexico; J. T. SPRIGGS, CHARLES E. BOYLE, ISAAC S. STRUBLE, BARNES, SADLER, DAWSON, COOPER, HERMAN, STEMES.

I also call your attention to the fact that the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fé Railway is desirous of breaking up the quarantine law, and to this end it has instructed its solicitor, Judge Waldo, of Santa Fé, to prepare suit to test its validity. This is probably the most important litigation in connection with the live-stock interests that will occur in the Territory for some years, for if our quarantine law be declared unconstitutional it will have the effect of flooding our ranges with Texas and diseased cattle.

Respectfully,

J. D. WARNER, Secretary.

"New Mexico must not be made the quarantine ground for Texas cattle." In other words, Texas cattle must not be allowed to enter New Mexico at any time or under any circumstances! They are liable to "flood our ranges!" Who gave these associations the public lands of New Mexico?

Mr. Chairman, an enormous amount of cheap beef is grown in Texas. It can not be consumed within her borders and is a source of supply for the whole country by the natural laws of trade. One of the principal outlets for it is by a trail up the Pecos River, in the extreme western part of the State. Whether the object is to sell beef cattle, to transfer young stock to the great maturing ranges of the Northwest, or to seek new ranges in unsettled regions, it is equally necessary to use this trail.

Almost all the land over which it passes through New Mexico and Arizona is United States Government land. There are a few scattered claims of bona fide agricultural settlers along the line, and it is customary to drive the herds around them without doing any damage whatever. It passes through New Mexico and into Arizona, and there is a violent opposition to its use by the stock associations of those Territories. I think these so-called inspection laws are made at the suggestion of these associations. They are so drawn as to partially accomplish the closing of the trail.

At the last session of the Legislative Assemblies of New Mexico and Arizona these associations, it is believed, used their power to secure the passage of the acts referred to. This was the more easily done because there existed at the time considerable public excitement, fostered by sensational newspaper reports, in regard to the probability of herds of cattle from the Gulf regions infecting with splenetic fever cattle on ranges over which they were driven.

What would have been a perfectly valid reason for legitimate inspection, had the facts been as supposed, was made use of to establish what amounts to an embargo.

Even men owning land within the Territorial boundaries can not reach it with their cattle without paying this enormous tax, and their land is used by those who are already inside.

The agricultural pioneer in his advance westward seeking a homestead on the public lands in a new country is generally accompanied by a small herd of cattle. They graze upon the unoccupied public lands surrounding his farm and yield him a support during the first two or three years before his wild land can be brought into proper condition for successful agriculture. These men with their cattle are effectually stopped on the New Mexico and Arizona frontiers by their inability to pay the enormous tax levied by these so-called quarantine laws and the other restrictions indicated, and the settlement of the Territories is greatly retarded. As far as the prevention of infection goes there is an act of Congress now in force, known as the pleuro-pneumonia act (United States Statutes, Forty-eighth Congress, first session, chapter 60), which affords ample protection to any State or Territory that wishes to prevent the entry of diseased cattle. The disapproval by Congress of these Territorial acts will not leave New Mexico and Arizona unprovided for in this respect.

Mr. Chairman, the land and stock syndicates in New Mexico and Arizona have no right to shut out a lawful competition or to build a Chinese wall around those Territories. They have no right to retard immigration or prevent the introduction of capital, or to establish monopolies in real estate or live-stock enterprises; and the Legislatures of these Territories have no constitutional authority to enact the law which I have quoted and block the progress of interstate commerce or levy these onerous and oppressive taxes upon the owners of cattle who may desire a fair showing in these Territories for purposes of commerce or obtaining homes.

I have said that this law is detrimental to the well-being and development of New Mexico. In this connection I will read an editorial found in a New Mexico paper confirmatory of what I have said. Coming as it does from that Territory, it is especially worthy of attention. Speaking of the bill introduced by me the Interpreter, published at White Oaks, N. Mex., says:

THE QUARANTINE FARCE,

Congressman LANHAM, of Texas, has introduced a bill to abrogate the quarantine law of New Mexico. This is a move in the right direction and we sincerely trust that the bill will be passed. There never was any necessity for this law. It inflicts unnecessary expense and trouble upon immigrants and cattle shippers, retards the development and settlement of New Mexico, prevents the introduction of capital, cows, and citizens, and accomplishes no good except for a few land pirates who want the whole earth

For years, to our personal knowledge, the Texas fever has been said to exist in the southwestern portion of that State. All during that time Texas cattle have been driven into and through New Mexico, and yet no one ever heard of any loss of stock in the Territory from Texas fever until a few individuals and companies, whose fraudulent land-holdings are well known, came to the front in the organizations of the various cattle associations in this country. The fact is the big cattle kings of New Mexico want to keep this land for themselves. They do not want any more settlers to come in, nor do they want more cattle to come. They organized as a cattle association and then went to Santa Fé and with the help of those in power got the quarantine law passed for the express purpose of preventing as far as they could the settlement of this fair land. The quarantine law is a farce, but one that makes the immigrants cry instead of laugh. It is an engine which is being used to prevent people from entering upon this fair domain and securing homes. It is a wicked law and ought to be abrogated.

I have also noticed the following special dispatch from El Paso, Tex., near the border of New Mexico, which merits consideration, as it purports to give the expression of prominent New Mexican stockmen as well as the newly appointed inspector for the southern district of New Mexico upon the same subject:

EL PASO, January 22, 1886.

It is possible that there will be a strong effort made to abolish the unjust territorial quarantine now prevailing against Texas cattle. Many prominent New Mexican stockmen see the unjustness and uselessness of the measure and openly urge that it be abolished, during the winter months at least. Alexander Rogers, the newly appointed inspector for the southern district of New Mexico, arrived here to-day to establish his headquarters. Like other fair-minded stockmen, he states that the quarantine is needless and works a great injustice to Texas and should be abolished for the winter at any rate. He said further that in the report which he will shortly make out he will state the situation and recommend a change. Great weight can be attached to the position of Mr. Rogers. He is one of the wealthiest and most far-seeing and fair-dealing stockmen in the Territory and furthermore holds a lucrative position which will be lost if the quarantine is abolished.

Mr. Chairman, much more could be said and abundant additional evidence produced to show the propriety of and necessity for the passage of this bill, but I will not consume further time, hoping that what I have said may prove sufficient to attract attention to its merits and invite for it a careful consideration which ought to be speedy, inasmuch as the annual spring movement of cattle will soon begin.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I wish to ask the gentleman from Texas the name of the paper he read from a moment ago.

Mr. LANHAM. The Interpreter, published at White Oaks, N. Mex. I will hand it to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The purpose of this bill which the gentleman advocates is, as I understand, to disapprove of the legislative acts on this subject as passed both by the New Mexico and Arizona Legislatures.

Mr. LANHAM. I have addressed myself more especially to the New Mexico act, but there is also a bill pending for the disapproval of a similar statute passed by the Territorial Assembly of Arizona to which I have alluded.

Mr. WEAVER, of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, from expressions of sentiment already recorded by the representatives of the people there can remain no doubt that for once the united efforts of the moneyed oligarchy, assisted by the executive officers of the nation, will fail to successfully carry out the conspiracy to double the nation's burden and paralyze the industries of the country by proposed legislation the sole object of which is to increase their own material wealth by making money dear and all species of property relatively cheap.

Think of the lamentable consequences, if once consummated, of the damnable conspiracy to deprive the common people of this country, in the sweat of whose faces the nation has achieved all her greatness and the conspirators all their amassed and uncounted millions, of the only money that ever reached the body of the people.

Who has ever seen gold dollars doing the business of this country? Those who have mingled with the masses and have knowledge of the ordinary business and commercial transactions carried on in this great country know well that gold is not the money that keeps alive the thousand industries that supply bread for the sustenance and clothes for the protection of the millions.

No one sees gold save the favored few, who through a failure on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to execute the plain letter of the law, by using silver, absorb all of this money. In defiance of the law successive Secretaries of the Treasury have created a class of favored creditors to whom all the nation's gold has been and is being paid, and now when all that precious coin and metal, except what still awaits them in the Treasury of the United States, has been gathered into the coffers of the money kings, comes the startling advice from the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue the coinage of silver, and the further advice from the Secretary to call in the $346,000,000 of the legal tenders.

If such advice were to prevail, what then would be the condition of our finances?

The money of the United States to-day is:

National-bank circulation	$269,000,000
Unlimited legal tender	346,000,000
Gold bullion and coin	609,000,000
Silver bullion and coin (including limited tender)	283,000,000
Total	1,507,000,000

Four hundred and ninety-four million of the above is the amount in the Treasury, as shown by the Treasurer's December statement, and is doing none of the business of the country, and if the policy shall still obtain to hold this large surplus in the Treasury, and if the further advice of the Secretary of the Treasury is to be followed in calling in the $346,000,000 of unlimited legal tenders—then for business purposes and all the commercial transactions of this great country we will have $1,507,000,000—($494,000,000 in the Treasury + $346,000,000 greenbacks), which leaves $667,000,000, or little more than $12 per capita for the sixty millions of people of the United States to carry on the business of a nation the extent of whose territory, the growth of whose population, and the wonderful increase of whose wealth, with her great commerce, coupled with an energy of her citizens that knows no bounds, requires more money per capita to foster and keep alive her industries and afford business facilities than any other nation on the globe. Think of her growth in territory, population, and commerce and her yet comparatively undeveloped condition before receiving with any degree of favor the suggestion to pursue a policy the tendency of which is to paralyze the industries and dampen the zeal of our citizens.

We have more than four times the extent of territory that we had originally on the acquisition of our independence.

The area of the United States in square miles is:

Original limits of the thirteen States	820,680
Louisiana, purchased of France in 1803 for $15,000,000	889,579
Florida, purchased of Spain in 1819 for $5,000,000	66,900
Territory confirmed by the Oregon treaty in 1842 and 1846	308,052
Texas, annexed in 1846 (Texas debt, $7,500,000)	318,000
New Mexico and California, in 1847 (cost of the war, $15,000,000)	522,955
Gadsden purchase, of Mexico, in 1853 for $10,000,000	45,535
Alaska, purchased of Russia in 1867 for $7,200,000	577,390
Total square miles	3,559,091

We have grown in population until we have twenty times what we had when our independence was secured.

Our growth from 1790 to 1880 is shown by each census to be—1790, 3,929,214; 1800, 5,308,483; 1810, 7,230,881; 1820, 9,633,822; 1830, 12,866,020; 1840, 17,069,453; 1850, 23,191,816; 1860, 31,443,321; 1870, 38,558,371; 1880, 50,155,783; and to-day we have nearly, if not quite, 60,000,000 of people.

Our growth in material wealth and in commerce has greatly surpassed our growth in territory and population.

The value of the annual products of the productive industries of the United States, as shown by the census of 1880, in a table taken from The Tariff Record, was:

The States of the Appalachian range and Atlantic plain, area 570,600 square miles:

Agriculture	$766,000,000
Manufactures	3,520,800,000
Mining and quarrying	99,300,000
Fisheries	33,430,000
Forestry	83,400,000
Aggregate value	4,502,930,000

To this sum should be added the products of the Pennsylvania and New York oil fields, valued in the census year at $20,000,000.

The States of the Rocky Mountain range, Pacific plateau, Sierra Nevada and Cascade ranges, and Pacific slope, area 1,330,000 square miles:

Agriculture	$95,500,000
Manufactures	158,800,000
Mining and quarrying	70,808,000
Fisheries	8,200,000
Forestry	11,941,000
Aggregate value	345,649,000

The States of the basin of the fluvial system of the Mississippi River, area 1,726,601 square miles:

Northern States:

Agriculture	$1,013,800,000
Manufactures	1,549,600,000
Mining and quarrying	56,315,000
Fisheries	1,614,000
Forestry	124,800,000
Aggregate value	2,746,129,000

Southern States:

Agriculture	342,300,000
Manufactures	172,500,000
Mining and quarrying	2,334,000
Fisheries	552,000
Forestry	17,800,000
Aggregate value	535,486,000

Grand total:

Agriculture	1,356,100,000
Manufactures	1,722,100,000
Mining and quarrying	58,649,000
Fisheries	2,166,000
Forestry	142,600,000
Aggregate value	3,281,615,000

RECAPITULATION.

Atlantic States	$4,502,930,000
Pacific States	345,649,000
Mississippi Valley States	3,281,615,000

These figures do not embrace the value of internal traffic, foreign commerce, and other branches of industry not productive, and therefore which do not add to the productive wealth of the country.

The growth in the resources of this country for thirty years may be seen from an official table taken from part 1, page 2, of the report treating on the internal commerce of the United States, which shows:

Resources.	1850.	1880.

*For the census year 1880.

Our foreign commerce for the year ending June 30, 1885, amounts to more than thirteen hundred millions of dollars.

Total exports	$725,682,946
Total imports	577,525,092

Our internal commerce amounts to more than ten times all our foreign commerce, and in round numbers equals fifteen thousand millions of dollars.

I have spoken of the wonderful development and resources of this country only to give emphasis to the proposition that a country which has made such acquisitions in people and wealth and carries on such an extended commerce can not without great loss and suffering be deprived of the most potent factors and agents that have kept alive the industries and multiplied the wealth of a thrifty and intelligent people—the silver dollar and the greenback dollar.

The arguments that might apply with some degree of force to fully developed portions of Europe, where comparatively no silver is produced, has no force in this great undeveloped country, that produces nearly one-half the silver of the world, and where all the annual gold product, were it all coined into dollars, would only be sufficient to pay three-fifths of the annual interest on the interest-bearing debt of the United States.

While our national liabilities draw a low rate of interest, yet the aggregate required annually for that purpose is about fifty millions of dollars and the annual gold product is but thirty millions and constantly diminishing.

I have said that this great country is as yet comparatively undeveloped.

The State of Texas alone with a population as dense as that of Belgium would have over 125,000,000 people; twice as much as the present population of the United States, or the same State peopled as France would have over 47,000,000 inhabitants.

Nebraska as densely populated as the Netherlands would contain nearly 24,000,000 human beings; Kansas peopled as Germany would number more than 17,000,000 souls; California as New York more than 16,000,000, and Dakota as Massachusetts nearly 33,000,000.

The whole United States peopled as Belgium is peopled would embrace more than 1,700,000,000 inhabitants, or thirty times our present population.

Germany has a population of 216 to the square mile, and has reached her greatness. England has a population of 289 to the square mile, and many years have passed since this nation was fully developed; since which time she has never forgotten to oppress and rob the poor.

The United States has but 14 inhabitants to the square mile, or but 1 where Germany has 15 and where England has 20.

Mr. Speaker, I ask in the name of Manning, and this without a desire to take this great name in vain, yes, and in the name of all the illustrious patriots—the present incumbent's immediate predecessors—who, in willful disobedience to the solemn enactments of Congress, have been trying to substitute gold for the palladium of our liberties (first, before opening the Treasury door to the golden horse, having made sure that no one was in the belly but the privileged class of creditors, namely, the bondholders), I ask, I say, why, in this great country of undeveloped resources, with its mines of gold and silver sufficient to supply its people with an abundance of good money, we should follow in the footsteps of England and Germany and lend the law-making power of this country to the agrandizement and enriching of the few and to the oppression of the many and the demoralization of the whole country?

This proposition to make gold alone the standard is an insult to the intelligence of all thinking men.

Mr. Speaker, aside from individual, corporate, and municipal indebtedness, the world's debts—I mean national indebtedness—amounts to $22,885,200,000, and the interest on this sum alone at 3 per cent. amounts to more than six times the annual gold product of the world.

The report of the Director of the Mint, pages 131 and 132, shows that the world's production of gold for 1884 was only $95,292,569, while the interest on the world's national indebtedness at 3 per cent. amounts to $686,556,000, or nearly seven times the whole annual product of gold throughout the world.

A glance at these figures, with the application of a very limited knowledge of mathematics by way of interest computation, should satisfy any one but expectant beneficiaries and their agents and Secretaries of the Treasury that we want all the silver of this country made into money, not only to aid in carrying on the varied industries of the country and to expedite and make sure of its development, but we want it to aid in paying off the $1,800,000,000 of indebtedness of this country, and, as well, to apply it in payment of that portion of the indebtedness covered by interest-bearing bonds as of that which bears no interest.

The law is plain and has made no distinction, but the favored class of creditors has been preferred, in defiance of the law, by one whose duty it was to execute the law. Here is the law; let it be read:

SEC. 3693. The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes, and of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver. But none of the interest-bearing obligations not already due shall be redeemed or paid before maturity, unless at such time United States notes are convertible into coin at the option of the holder, or unless at such time bonds of the United States bearing a lower rate of interest than the bonds to be redeemed can be sold at par in coin. The faith of the United States is also solemnly pledged to make provisions at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin.

SEC. 3694. The coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

Second. To the purchase or payment of 1 per cent. of the entire debt of the United States, to be made within each fiscal year, which is to be set apart as a sinking fund, and the interest of which shall in like manner be applied to the purchase or payment of the public debt, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time direct.

Third. The residue to be paid into the Treasury.

It does not take a lawyer to interpret this statute so plainly written. A butcher, a wood-sawyer, a street-car driver, or a chimney-sweep can understand it. Yes, any one but a Secretary of the Treasury knows just what ought to be done.

You will remember that when Ulysses was invited to join the clans in avenging the wrong that had been perpetrated upon the King of Sparta by taking a hand in the siege of Troy, he played he was crazy. The truth is, he wanted to stay with his beautiful Penelope, and for the further reason of the coupon interest recently clipped in the shape of his son Telemachus.

When Ulysses was detected in his trick he went along all right.

And now that the Secretary has been detected in his trick of playing crazy when refusing to pay out the silver coin to the bondholders as provided by law, while his true reason is his love for the bondholders and his high regard for their coupons and his desire to stay with them, we do hope that he will follow the example of Ulysses and from this time execute the law in good faith for the people and not forget that the bondholders and Wall Street gamblers are but a small portion of the people of the United States.

From the standpoint of national indebtedness alone we can readily see how impracticable it is to undertake to erect the single standard of gold, but when we go a step further and consider municipal, corporate, and private indebtedness, and then consider the amount of gold there is in the world, together with the annual product, the proposition appears too absurd to discuss.

The world's debts of corporations, states, and municipalities amount to nearly $12,000,000,000 and private indebtedness amounts to over $70,000,000,000, so that all the debts of the world—national, corporate, and private—amount to more than one hundred thousand millions, while all the gold in the world is less than four thousand millions; hence if all the gold in the world were at once applied to the liquidation of the debts of the world it would not pay 25 per cent. of the same, and all the world's annual product of gold would not pay one-tenth of 1 per cent. on the aggregate indebtedness of the world.

Now, Mr. Speaker, for an answer to the inquiry as to whether or not the bondholders have had more or less than what they are entitled to by the law under which the Government became obligated, let the facts bear witness and attest to the wrongs that have been inflicted upon the people and the favors that have been extended to the bondholders by a failure to execute the law in the first instance, and in the second instance by Congress yielding to the importunities and influence of the bondholders and passing the law of 1869 which pledged the faith of the Government for coin in the discharge of this indebtedness.

Up to that time legal tenders, commonly known as the greenback, was lawful money for the discharge of the bonded obligations of the Government, and no one could plead a want of knowledge of this fact, because written upon this circulation, on each and every dollar, we find "This note is a legal tender at its face value for all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt."

This was the money that paid for the bonds when gold ranged from $1.17½ to $2.18. From 1862 to 1866, inclusive, the price of gold in greenbacks was:

1863	1 47½
1864	2 18

During the five years, on an average, it took $1.62 in legal tender to buy $1 in gold, so that on an average for all these years $100 in gold, by first converting it into legal-tender notes, would buy $162 in bonds, and this is the way in which the bonds were bought—bought with greenbacks and were payable in the same money; and yet not a dollar in greenback currency was ever paid in discharge of bonded indebtedness, and notwithstanding the greenback had paid for the bonds and paid the Army of more than two and one-half millions of soldiers who saved both the country and the bonds and had greatly appreciated in value since the purchase of the bonds, yet the rapacity of this species of pediculi that has been sucking the blood of the nation (the bondholders) was not satisfied until the passage of the act of 1869 pledging the Government to the payment of the bonded obligations in coin. By this wicked and unpatriotic legislation from twenty to thirty cents on every dollar of bonded indebtedness was legislated into the pockets of the bondholders and out of the pockets of the tax-payers of this country, because at the time of this legislation the greenback dollar would buy only about 70 cents in coin.

One would suppose that the national devil-fishes, with whose tentacles has already been clawed out of the national Treasury several hundred millions of dollars by the legislation of 1869 without any consideration received on the part of the Government, could see it to their own interest to rest content with the one grand larceny so successfully consummated, lest by their continued efforts to absorb all the national revenues by making money scarce they might so paralyze the hands of industry as to make doubtful the ability on the part of the Government to pay their continued exactions—but their greed seems to have no limit.

We are constantly reminded of the great drain made upon the national Treasury by the payment of such immense amounts of pensions to our soldiers, but the amount paid in pensions is comparatively small when compared with the amount that has been paid to the bondholders.

There has already been paid to the bondholders four times the amount of money that has been paid to the soldiers, their widows and orphans, as may be seen by the report of the Commissioner of Pensions.

Total amount paid to pensioners	765,092,640 18
Excess paid bondholders and pensioners	2,328,981,224 01

The soldier was paid for his services when it took on an average during the war $1.62 in greenbacks to buy $1 in gold, but while the greenbacks saved the country and bought the bonds it was not good enough for the privileged class, and was in 1869 actually demonetized so far as being applicable to the bonded indebtedness is concerned, and then for the first time the nation was pledged to pay coin.

And again by the act of 1870 the national debt was refunded and again the bondholders exacted a pledge at the hands of the Government that the bonds should be paid in coin of the standard value prescribed by the act of July 14, 1870, and to the end that no one should be able to gainsay the fact, upon the face of the bond was written the pledge of the Government to pay both the interest and principal in coin of the standard value of the United States of July 14, 1870.

Our silver dollar was an unlimited legal-tender then and is now, and contained the same amount of silver with the same degree of fineness then as now; yet for all these years not one dollar in silver has been paid the bondholders, while the Secretary of the Treasury is constantly complaining that the vaults of the Treasury are overloaded with silver dollars, and this in the face of the fact that more than one hundred and ninety-four millions of the national debt are option bonds and drawing interest, and can be paid at the pleasure of the Government, and are payable in silver coin of the present standard.

From this state of facts what should be the judgment of the country upon this kind of management?

It should be what it is, that the conspiracy of the bondholders to make a second raid upon the Treasury by repudiating the written contract and demonetizing silver, and thus double the value of the bonds, is being aided and abetted by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Who can wonder at the general stagnation of business throughout the country? Who can utter surprise that hundreds of thousands of strong, willing men throughout the country should be idle and their families perishing from hunger and cold while the country was never so full and overflowing with everything to make life happy? Yet the laborers—the producers of wealth—are unable to obtain the necessaries of life. But I say who should be surprised at this state of affairs when five hundred millions of the people's money is locked up in the Treasury; when it is recommended by the head of the Treasury that three hundred and forty-six millions more be taken from the business industries of the country, and that we discontinue the coinage of silver; when one-half of the gold of the country is locked up in the Treasury, and every inducement on the part of the executive power of the nation is held out to hoard up and keep from the active business of the world the other half, through the hope of making one dollar worth two, by striking down silver and discontinuing its coinage?

I tell you that the laws of our country which have so ruthlessly been put under foot by the executive department of the Government must be executed.

The damnable conspiracy to shear the people semi-annually has to be abandoned.

The money in the Treasury must be put into circulation by the payment on the nation's matured debt, and the interest thereby stopped—because the law provides for this.

Why pass other laws when the laws remain a dead letter upon the statute-books? Why ask by resolution for the policy of the Executive when we all know what that policy is? A policy to absolutely disregard the solemn enactment of Congress.

I think it was John the Baptist when on the Jordan circuit who announced that a greater than he was to come after him. It is safe to say that if our Secretary of the Treasury had been there in place of John the announcement would never have been made.

What has the Secretary of the Treasury to do with policies? The Congress of the United States it is that makes policies and crystallizes them into laws and there remains but one thing for the Secretary of the Treasury to do, and that is to carry out the enactment of Congress.

I favor free coinage of all silver bullion produced in the United States. Because of our great undeveloped resources and our great internal commerce, which exceeds that of any other nation in the world, no people require more money per capita nor can support more silver per capita, as a part of her money, than the people of the United States.

The legislator who has fear that we would be overburdened with silver dollars under free coinage, limited to our own silver production, based on present annual output of mines in the United States, ought to be returned to the school-house until he has acquired such a knowledge of figures as to be able to show from our quantity of annual silver supply when applied to our increasing population and demand for business facilities that all our available silver coined into dollars would not keep pace with our increasing population and business demands.

Let us see where figures take us. France, with a population of 38,000,000 and no undeveloped territory, has a circulation of $550,000,000 of silver, or $14½ per capita. The United States, with a population of 60,000,000, to carry the same amount of silver per capita would require $870,000,000 in silver. The continued coinage of $40,000,000 a year for twenty years with the amount of silver we have on hand would only put us a little in advance of France, and that based on our present population. But judging of our prospective population twenty years hence, as shown by census returns, where will we be in point of population at the end of that time?

From 1870 to 1880 our growth in population was nearly 33⅓ per cent., and we have closely approximated to this increase at each decennial enumeration since 1790. This per cent. in ten years would give us a population of 60,000,000 + ⅓ of 60,000,000, or 80,000,000, and at the end of another ten years would give us 80,000,000 + ⅓ of 80,000,000, or nearly 107,000,000 population.

At the end of twenty years, if we were to keep every dollar of $40,000,000 coined each year in the country, together with the amount we now have, we would have of silver about $1,000,000,000, which to a population of 107,000,000 would give $9 per capita instead of $14.50 now carried by France. And from that time forward with an increasing population of 33⅓ per cent. the coinage of $40,000,000 per annum—and this is the limit of our present production after deducting the amount used in the arts and manufacturing—would only amount to $1 per capita for the increase; that is, the annual coinage would equal only $1 per capita for increase in population for a decennial period or $10 per capita for coinage during a whole decade. Figures show that with the coinage of $40,000,000 per year, with our increase of population, we never could reach $10 per capita or $4.50 per capita less than France has to-day. Let us see. We have now reached the end of twenty years, when, judging from our past growth, we have 107,000,000 population, and this increased for the next decade 33⅓ per cent. will give us 107,000,000 + one-third of 107,000,000, or about 143,000,000. And the ten years of coinage at $40,000,000 per annum would give us $400,000,000 to add to the $1,000,000,000 already coined, or $1,400,000,000, which amount would supply to our increased population between $9 and $10 per capita, as will readily be seen by dividing the population into the number of silver dollars: $1,400,000,000 ÷ 143,000,000 (population) gives 9\frac{11}{13}$ per capita.

One step further shows to a mathematical certainty that relying upon continued increase of population, as shown by our past history, we could never reach the maximum point of $10 per capita in silver by coining $40,000,000 per annum.

At the end of the next decennial period our population would stand 143,000,000 + 33⅓ per cent. of 143,000,000, which is a little more than 190,000,000. And silver coin at this time would be $1,400,000,000 + $400,000,000, the product of ten years' coinage at $40,000,000 per annum, which would give $1,800,000,000, and this number of dollars divided by our population, now increased to 190,000,000, would give us 9\frac{9}{19}$ per capita, or the same number of dollars per capita as before with a smaller fraction. And now we have reached a period where with continued average increase of population and a coinage of $40,000,000 per annum the amount per capita would continuously grow less.

After a careful inquiry, as is shown by the report of the Director of the Mint, 1883, page 15, by sending out 8,000 circular letters, 5,406 of which were answered, it was ascertained that between five and six millions of silver is used in the arts and in manufacturing, and of course this must fall far short of comprehending the full amount so it is safe to say that under free coinage not over $40,000,000 per annum would flow to the mints for coinage, where limited to domestic bullion.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is no use of arguing this question with a view to convincing the money-kings of this country. Their whole purpose is to steal something by legislation, by act of Congress. Nothing so much as class legislation and a failure on the part of the Treasury to fairly execute the law has made it possible for a few designing schemers to literally rob the nation.

Nothing seems to satisfy their ambition but gold. They strive to appease their passions; they endeavor to pacify their consciences with the gilded bauble of wealth.

Love of country—patriotism—a desire for the prosperity of the masses never found lodgment in their ignoble souls. Favoritism must stop. The representatives of the people must correct the existing evils and legislate for the masses, or in absence of this, when there shall be no other hope, the barefooted militia will come down from the hills and take charge of the Capitol.

The safety of the people rests in the honest administration of the laws. Had the law been properly administered there would be no complaint of too much silver in the country. What a shallow pretense to urge against the coinage of silver that as fast as it is paid out it comes back to the Treasury. Why should it not come back to the Treasury? The Treasury is open for that purpose—of receiving dues to the Government and as frequently paying the same out in discharge of Government obligations. That is what money is for—to discharge obligations. Can not the Treasurer pay out the money as frequently as it is returned so long as the nation has millions of matured debt drawing interest? The surplus money in the Treasury should be applied on the debts of the nation and made to do the business of the country instead of being locked up in the Treasury, and then general prosperity would follow; but so long as the Treasury is managed in the especial interest of Wall-street gamblers general prosperity will not be known.

Nearly all the bankers and bondholders of the East have joined the crusade against silver, and for the obvious reason that by destroying silver they greatly increase the value of the gold and money securities in their hands. They arrogate to themselves an exclusive knowledge on finance, and, in the past, by their united efforts, have controlled Congress and the action of the Treasury officials to the great detriment of the general public.

I know of but one firm of New York bankers who have shown the manhood to expose the fallacies of this great cry against silver, and I will incorporate as part of my remarks a circular letter from this New York banking firm, the name of which is Moore & Schley:

NEW YORK, February 17, 1886.

While it is conceded that the controlling factors in the financial and business situation favor a higher range of values on the Stock Exchange, there is a very general apprehension here at the East that some action by Congress on the silver question may affect the market adversely. It would be well, therefore, to consider this matter from a common sense point of view, so that dealers in securities may know what to do if Congress should follow one of several possible courses.

The prevalent belief among those who are best posted is that the present Congress will not suspend the coinage of the silver dollar, and that matters will go on for another year as they have for the past eight years; that is, that every month $2,000,000 of silver bullion will be coined into standard dollars. Assuming that this will be the case, what effect will it have upon the market? The advocates of silver coinage claim that we can only judge by the experience of the last eight years, which they say has been favorable not only to the value of securities but all values, because since that time we have been steadily adding to our stores of gold, without very largely increasing our silver reserve. The fact is emphasized that from 1873 to 1878 inclusive, a period of six years, the exports of gold exceeded the imports by $123,754,210, an average of $20,625,000 a year.

Since the passage of the silver bill in 1878, the imports of gold have exceeded the exports by $200,856,031; this, too, in addition to retaining in the country all the gold we mined. In 1877 we had in the United States less than $200,000,000 of gold. The Financial Chronicle estimates it at $175,000,000, but the Mint authorities say $193,000,000. The Director of the Mint, in his report just issued, estimates the total stock of gold on January 1, 1886, at $626,733,863, showing an addition to our gold reserve of $433,000,000 since the passage of the silver coinage act in 1878. Curiously enough the excess of our exports of silver over imports since 1878 has been about $16,000,000 per annum. According to the Mint authorities, our total stock of silver is $297,904,950, considerably less than half our stock of gold. Every year since the silver coinage act was passed has seen our store of gold increase, relatively to our store of silver. These facts are curiously at variance with the belief so generally entertained that the silver coinage, under what is known as the Gresham law, is driving gold out of the country. Bimetallic France has had similar experience. With 20,000,000 less population than the United States, it has a coinage of nearly 600,000,000 five-franc pieces, the equivalent of our silver dollars, or some $380,000,000 more than our total silver coinage. At the same time France holds more gold than any nation on earth. Its gold reserve is $850,000,000. The Bank of France shows a steady gain in its gold reserve, while that of England and Germany, the gold-mint countries, remains stationary. The Bank of France, at present, holds $30,000,000 more in gold than the banks of England and Germany combined. According to the silver advocates, were we to continue coining silver dollars at the rate of two million per month we would not have as many as France, relatively, until a good way into the twentieth century; and yet the French 5-franc pieces, with 3 per cent. less silver than the American standard dollars, circulates on a par with gold.

But there are other facts which seem to show that silver coinage has not proved detrimental. The following comparison of the condition of the national banks in 1877 and 1885 shows that they, at least, have lost nothing by the silver coinage:

	October 30, 1877.	October 30, 1885.
Capital stock	$479,500,000	$527,500,000
Undivided profits and surplus funds	167,300,000	206,500,000
Specie	22,700,000	174,900,000
Deposits	630,400,000	1,120,100,000

Then the deposits in savings-banks in 1885 show that they were $200,000,000 greater than in 1881. The figures for 1877 are not available, or they would show a still larger increase.

The fact that exchange is near the gold exporting point, and that some of the yellow metal has been shipped since January 1, has led to the fear that we will lose a great deal of gold in the near future. But, as the Evening Post and other anti-silver publications have shown, this does not seem at all credible while the balance of trade is in our favor. The exports and imports of the United States, as reported by the Bureau of Statistics, for six successive years are instructive on this point. The values of the merchandise exports and imports for the entire year have been, in millions of dollars:

	1880.	1881.	1882.	1883.	1884.	1885.
Exports	889.7	883.5	768.0	795.2	749.4	688.8
Imports	696.8	670.2	732.9	687.1	629.3	587.5
Excess of exports	192.9	163.3	35.1	108.1	120.1	101.3

Then the current stock speculation is attracting European money for investment this side of the water.

True, our exports have fallen off in money value; we are shipping some gold, and may continue for a time to do so, but we have plenty of the yellow metal to spare.

But suppose the extremists should succeed in committing the Government to as free a coinage of silver as of gold, what would happen? The silver men claim that even then there would be no premium on gold until the proportion of the silver to gold would be greater than it now is in France. With 20,000,000 more population we have only $220,000,000 in silver, less than $4 per capita, while France has $600,000,000, or about $14. Our gold reserve is about $11 per capita, while that of France is about $23. At this rate we could coin $1,000,000,000 in silver, without excluding gold from circulation. What the silver men themselves claim for free coinage is perhaps best expressed in one of the resolutions passed at the Metropolitan Hotel silver meeting.

"Resolved, That in the event of free coinage being enacted the United States need not fear either an export of her gold or a very large increase of her silver; for if other nations send their silver to our mints to be coined in larger quantities than now, they must do so either to distribute it here in payment for merchandise which they have not hitherto been buying, in which case they would increase our exports and quicken and stimulate our production; or they must do so in order to exchange it in this country when coined for gold; but in such case, if gold is at a premium, its holders here will get the premium and the country will lose nothing, and if gold is not at a premium here in silver, then the inducement to send the silver here will have disappeared and it will not come."

While free coinage might be carried in the House of Representatives, it would hardly go through the Senate, and if it did would be promptly vetoed by President Cleveland. It is not improbable that Congress will authorize the issue of one and two dollar certificates in place of the greenbacks of similar denominations. This will practically add forty to fifty million more dollars to the hundred and forty million now in circulation. This will end the accumulation of silver, except as against certificates, which would be reassuring to the speculative public. In a general way it may be laid down as an axiom that every addition to the currency of the country enhances values, and that when either gold, silver, or their paper representatives are withdrawn their prices fall off.

It is now to be considered what would occur were the silver coinage to be suspended. The impression is universal at the West and South that there would be an immediate break in prices of all kinds. The price of silver has already fallen from 51d. to 46¼d. per ounce. It would probably take a slump of 35d. If this one metal only was affected it would be a comparatively trifling matter; but in the shrinkage of values which has taken place since bimetallism was set aside by the commercial world, silver has proved to be the best measurer of values; that is to say, silver to-day will buy as much of any product of land or labor as it did before it was demonetized in Europe in 1872. The real phenomenon is that the purchasing power of gold has increased from 20 to 30 per cent. Were the American support of the silver market withdrawn the purchasing power of gold would be enormously enhanced, which fact would show itself in an unprecedented crash in prices. This view would not be the correct one, but every operator in the West would sell the market right and left, and there would be plenty here at the East to follow their example. Indeed, the main argument of those who favor the stoppage of the silver coinage is that it will create so much bimetallism. There has been great suffering in England, especially among those who do business with the East Indies, where silver is the exclusive currency, and its depreciation makes exchange so high as to turn trade profits into losses.

Probably this reasoning of the anti-silver coinage advocates is correct; but as we are having a revival of business and a buoyant feeling, not only on the stock exchange but in all departments of trade, it does not seem probable that an American Congress would care to do evil that possible good may come, and thus voluntarily bring about the same distrustful condition of things which exists in England and Germany, the two leading gold-unit countries. Demonstrations by mobs of unemployed workmen, such as have been seen in London and the manufacturing districts of England, are not experiences such as the American public will care to go through.

In the above the silver side of this controversy is presented for the reason that the anti-silver newspapers and financial authorities of the East have had the ear of our public almost exclusively. Those who deal in securities should have all the data for forming correct judgments of their own.

Yours, respectfully,

MOORE & SCHLEY.

This letter, embracing as it does many facts and figures covering the whole financial question, sustains the conclusions of my arguments on the proposition that there is no danger to be apprehended from the full and free coinage of silver.

Mr. CLEMENTS. Mr. Chairman, it has been directly charged by the enemies of the standard silver dollar that it is a "dishonest dollar." Is this true? If it is, then our laws are wrong, and the Government is a perpetrator of fraud against its own people. What foundation is there for this charge? As faithful representatives of honest constituencies it becomes our duty to answer this question. If the allegation be true, then the wrong should be righted, for the honor of the people we represent is more precious than silver or gold.

But upon what reason do the enemies of silver in their warfare upon it base this indictment of fraud and dishonesty? It is not because a silver dollar will not buy as much as a gold dollar in our country, nor that it will not purchase as much of any of the commodities of trade or the necessities of life as it ever did. Therefore, it is not because silver is not worth as much as it has ever been when tested by its purchasing capacity; and beyond controversy this is the only true and honest test, for this is its sole use as coin. But it is said that where it is not by law made a legal tender it is only worth from 80 to 85 cents; and upon this statement of fact the charge of dishonesty is based.

By what measure of value is this alleged depreciation of silver arrived at? It is not pretended that it is ascertained or proven in any other way than by its relative value as compared to gold, and that in such countries as have demonetized silver. What right have we to judge here of the value of our silver dollars, or of their honesty as legal-tender, debt-paying dollars by the gold standard alone where silver has not been depreciated but gold has been enhanced in value by reason alone of the total or partial demonetization of silver in other countries? I submit that gold is not the only standard or test of value by which silver is to be tried. Capital seeks to demonetize what appears to be the more plentiful metal and to make the dearer one the sole standard. Germany and Austria demonetized gold and made silver the standard in 1857 for fear of an inundation from the rich mines of California and Australia. In Austria silver is still the standard and gold is only a commodity and not money.

The following tables show that of the people of the world over 700,000,000 have adopted silver as the sole standard, and over 180,000,000 the double standard, gold and silver, and less than 90,000,000 the single gold standard:

According as one of these metals has been demonetized the other has appreciated in value where it has been erected as the sole standard. Why? Simply because debt-paying money has been made scarcer and therefore, harder to obtain by the striking down of the other metal, and the purchasing power of the former is thereby increased.

We must judge of the honesty of our silver coin in the light of our own laws, our own condition, and our own obligations, rather than by the whims and fancies of other governments wholly different from ours in form and purpose, and with different surroundings and interests. Ours is not an effete monarchy. It is not a despotism ruled in the interest of a ruling class or subservient to capitalists and creditors irrespective of the rights of others, or rather it should not be. Ours is, in theory at least, a government by the people, for the people. It should be as jealously watchful of the rights of the humblest citizen as it is of its own honor. The disposition of the question under consideration will materially affect the rights and conditions of all classes of the people, for the ability of the debtor to pay depends largely upon the supply of money. If it is plentiful it is more easily obtained and it takes less property to procure it than when it is scarce, for then it is dearer and requires more property to be sacrificed to raise it. The creditor will be affected by the determination of the question, for it will in great measure determine the value or the purchasing power of his money, which becomes greater just in proportion as money is made scarcer.

When we consider the magnitude of indebtedness, as shown by the following statement and estimate, which must be discharged in lawful money, we can better appreciate the importance of the determination of what shall be lawful money and the amount of it:

Statement of the national, State, county, municipal, and railroad debt in the United States, and an estimate of the individual real and personal mortgage debt.

United States, 1885	$1,438,542,995
Aggregate State, funded and unfunded, 1885	262,175,245
Territorial, 1880	179,178
County, 1880	123,677,668
Municipal	698,270,199
Railroad, funded, 1884	3,669,115,772
Individual mortgages (estimated)	6,000,000,000
Total	12,192,161,057

What right has the creditor to refuse payment in the legal-tender coin of the law at the time of the contract? What right has he to demand payment in a dearer coin? Is he not asking substantially an impairment of the contract in his own favor and against the debtor? This brings us to the consideration of what have been the legal-tender coins of our country. Among the powers of Congress enumerated in the Constitution are the following: "To coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures." The same instrument forbids that the States shall "make anything but gold and silver coin a tender in payment of debts." Silver is just as much the recognized coin of the Constitution as gold.

Under the authority above cited Congress, as far back as 1792, authorized the unlimited coinage of silver as well as gold, establishing exactly the standard silver dollar of to-day of 412½ grains. Its coinage as legal-tender money was not interrupted until 1873–'74. Then in 1878 a limited amount of not more than $4,000,000 and not less than $2,000,000 was required to be coined per month. It has ever since its establishment orginally been a legal tender except as limited from 1873 to 1878, yet we hear constantly of the so-called "gold bonds" and "gold obligations" of the Government, and the bonds principal and interest are being paid in gold, in compliance with the avaricious demands of the holders. There are justly and legally no gold obligations of the Government except gold certificates; the former are all payable upon their face in coin, not gold alone, for we have already seen that silver is as much a part of our legal coin as gold is. A bond, therefore, payable in coin is payable in either silver or gold at the option of the debtor.

It is discouraging to him who loves justice to see how unjustly and oppressively the tax-paying people have been discriminated against in the interest of manipulating capitalists. The holders of greenbacks by the funding of the public debt became holders first of bonds bearing 6 per cent. interest, the latter payable in coin. Then in 1869, at the hands of a Republican Congress, by some means they secured the passage of an act requiring payment of the principal of their bonds in coin, notwithstanding the greenbacks which they had exchanged for them at so great an advantage were receivable at their face value "for all debts, public and private, except interest on the public debt and customs dues."

This specific exception of the "interest on the public debt" and not the principal, as well as the stipulation in the bonds to pay the interest in coin and the absence of such a stipulation as to the principal, clearly shows that the demand of the bondholders was unfounded, except in their greed, and the allowance of it was a great wrong against the taxpayers. Not content with these ill-gotten advantages, and fearing that their right to hold them might be questioned, they secured in the act of July 14, 1870, a provision requiring the new bonds under that act to be paid, principal and interest, in coin of the standard value prescribed by law at that date. At this time the coinage of silver was free and unlimited. They were thus cautious to secure themselves against any possible fluctuation by reason of a change in the standard weight of either coin by subsequant legislation.

Still not content, they secured the demonetization of silver in 1873 by means since characterized as stealth, hoping thereby to secure payment of their bonds in gold alone and that greatly enhanced in value and purchasing power by reason of the striking down of silver. Their bonds were already exempted from taxation of any kind. Why should accumulated capital be so favored while the poor pay taxes on the little they have? In addition to all this they are permitted under the national banking laws to make these bonds a basis for banking and to issue bills amounting to 90 per cent. of the amount of the bonds as currency. Within a few years the holders of greenbacks, taxable and non-interest bearing, not worth over 50 cents on the dollar, have by the means just recited become holders of non-taxable interest-bearing bonds payable in coin, principal and interest. Actually being paid in gold, and while their interest is regularly paid by the Government, they issue and use bank bills amounting to 90 per cent. of the bonds—all without additional investment or consideration since they became the owners of the depreciated greenbacks.

Accustomed to having their demands granted at the expense of the tax-burdened people they in 1881 demanded and secured at the hands of Rutherford B. Hayes a veto of an act refunding a part of the public debt and reducing the rate of interest on the same. What right, legal or moral, have they to demand more now than the contract entitles them to? They should be content with the money of the contract—the money of the Constitution, silver or gold at the option of the debtor.

To establish the single standard of gold and demonetize silver would be to require all debtors to sacrifice more property to procure gold or its equivalent to pay their debts contracted when silver was at par and a legal tender than they will have to do if both are retained. This would be no less unjust and oppressive to the debtor than it would to the creditor to arbitrarily scale and reduce his claim merely to favor the debtor. Neither would be right. It is contended that we should increase the amount of silver in the dollar so as to bring it up to gold in value everywhere. This would be the same wrong, the same oppression, because it would be requiring that much more of value to obtain a dollar or the bullion to make a dollar. To require silver bullion of equal value to the gold bullion in a dollar would be to further burden debtors under existing laws about 20 per cent. which, on the aggregate of ascertained and estimated indebtedness referred to, would amount to $2,438,432,209.

Those who have been the beneficiaries of so much and oft-repeated favoritism at the hands of the Republican Congresses of the past now have the audacity to demand the suspension of the coinage of silver. This is one demand that will not be granted, if I may be permitted to judge beforehand of the action of this House. It ought not to be granted. It is time that the great body of the people who support the Government were receiving some consideration at the hands of Congress.

But let us notice another objection that is urged against the coinage of silver. It is said that its demonetization in other countries and continued coinage in this will tend to drive the gold out of our country and to bring in the silver from those countries where it is demonetized. Like many theories, this looks plausible upon its face; but the facts do not sustain it. It is safer to follow the truth, demonstrated by actual experience, by stubborn facts, than to be frightened to the right or to the left by mere unsupported theory.

When the coinage act of 1878 was passed the cry went up that gold would leave our country and depreciated silver would take its place. This evil has been prophesied from that day to this. But what are the facts? The coinage of silver at the present rate has been going on now for seven years, and there is to-day more gold in the country than there was seven years ago. For the last fiscal year ended June 30, 1885, our total exports of gold were $8,476,892, while our imports for the same year were $26,691,696, showing an excess of imported gold of $18,214,804. Our exports of silver for 1884 were $26,051,426, for 1885 $33,750,633, an excess of $7,698,207 last year over the year before. Despite the warnings and evil prophecies of those who look with horror for the substitution of what they are pleased to call the "baser metal" for gold the importation of the latter has increased while the exportation of the former has increased. In 1873, while silver was demonetized, it was estimated that there was in this country at that time $135,000,000 gold coin; it was then at a premium of 15½ per cent. About $98,000,000 of this was in the Treasury and in the national banks, not in actual circulation. In 1876 the amount was estimated to be $153,493,378.

The coinage of silver therefore has not driven gold away from us. It has not begun to do so. It does not threaten to do so. There is no cause for alarm on this account. The balance of trade—that is, the difference between the value of products exported and imported—has far more to do with the influx or outgo of gold than does the coinage of silver. This balance, owing to the richness of our soil, the amount and variety of our productions of agriculture and manufactures, and the thrift and energy of the American people, has continued in our favor. The surest way to preserve this balance in our favor is by wise laws justly administered to promote individual prosperity among the people. If we have individual prosperity, national prosperity must follow.

There should be a removal of vexatious restraints upon commerce, grievous burdens and unjust discriminations imposed by vicious laws, which inure to the advantage of a favored few and oppress the many. The thrift of the American people and the richness of their heritage would insure untold prosperity, individual and national, if freed from the blighting effects of unjust discriminations and oppressive burdens. There should be sufficient currency provided to meet the requirements of the increasing population, business, and developments of our growing country. Money that is good enough for the employés of the Government, its officers and laborers, ought to be good enough for the bondholder, who is favored in so many ways.

The last objection urged against the further coinage of silver which I shall notice is that the money vaults are crowded and we will soon have no place to put it. This is scarcely worthy of reply. In the first place, no sufficient reason has been shown why it is not paid out in discharge of our bonds, now subject to call, and upon which we are paying interest, while the silver that ought to be in circulation lies idle in the Treasury. The reason why it has not been put in circulation, I fear, is that it has not been in the hands of its friends. The minimum amount required by law is all that has at any time been coined under the present law. Repeated recommendations have been made for a suspension of this, and that which is required by the law to be coined is not paid out on due bonds and put in circulation, but is hoarded in vaults. If its inconvenience be an objection to it, that is obviated by the silver certificate, which is especially popular and acceptable among the people.

If there is not room for it in the vaults there is in the pockets of the people, where it will find its way if you pay it out to the creditors of the Government, who will employ it in the various business channels of the country, and it will reach the people. Compel the bondholder to take it according to the contract, and he will then be found helping to sustain silver and not to degrade it. There ought to be an increase of the coinage of silver. The annual production of gold is slightly decreasing, while population and commerce are increasing; and, notwithstanding the diminishment in the annual gold production, there is an estimated increase in the amount of bullion and coin used in the arts and manufactures. In the year 1883 $4,875,000 of gold coin was used in this way. The following statement shows the amounts of gold and silver bullion used for these purposes during the last fiscal year:

Deposits of gold and silver bullion at assay office, at New York, for bars supposed to have been used in the arts and manufactures during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1885.

Some professed friends of silver say that the only way to uphold it is to suspend coinage here until it can be resumed in other countries which have demonetized it. While we must admit that the action of other great powers toward the coins must affect us in greater or less degree it would be un-American for us to conform at once to foreign policies without an effort to maintain our national coins intact, and to uphold one of the great products of this country. The remedy is not to suspend but to increase the coinage. The amazing prosperity of France after her unsuccessful conflict with Prussia, with an immense public debt, has been largely attributed to her financial policy. She provided and has maintained in circulation an ample volume of currency. With a population of about 33,000,000 she has over $850,000,000 in gold coin and about $541,000,000 in silver, or a total of about $1,391,000,000, beside a paper currency of about $556,000,000, making in all $1,947,000,000 or over $50 per capita. With about two-thirds the population of the United States she has twice as much silver coin, which is a legal tender at par and circulates.

The amount of money of all kinds, including paper, in the United States, hoarded and in circulation, is not over $24 per capita. In the face of these facts I fail to see the danger attending continued coinage, but upon the other hand I believe that the present continued depression is in fact the result of a lack of sufficient currency to meet the demands of the business of the country. A sufficiency of currency would stimulate business, lead to investments, developments, and remunerative employment for labor, and consequent prosperity. Scarcity of money embarrasses business and produces stagnation, prevents employment of labor, and causes suffering. Our condition demands increased coinage rather than suspension.

The Secretary of the Treasury in his report states that about 54 per cent. of the metal money of the world is silver and about 46 per cent. gold. The United States is by far the greatest silver-producing country in the world and can not afford to aid in striking it down. It does not appear that other nations have so completely abandoned silver as the monometallists would seem to represent. The appended statements show the world's production of both metals for the years 1882–'83–'84; also the coinage of various countries for the same years. These tables are taken from the report of the Director of the Mint.

Silver has been the stand-by of the people in many times of depression and threatened disaster, remaining among them when gold, the dearer metal, had to some extent concentrated in the hands of capitalists and bankers so that it has been, and that not without reason, called the "people's money." The effort to destroy it is but one more step in line with many that have been taken heretofore to transfer the earnings of the masses to the coffers of the rich and the strong. At no time in the history of our country has it been so important to the interests of the people as now for them to have a large circulation of silver. It will go far in protecting them against the effects of the manipulations and speculations of those who in recent years have absorbed unprecedented fortunes, which are often combined and organized in support of schemes for further accumulation of the products of toil by those who toil not and yet by their wits absorb the wealth produced by others. It is the money of the fathers and of the Constitution, tested by experience and approved by the people. Let us have more of it.

Mr. JONES, of Texas. Mr. Chairman, in the discussion of the currency or any other question of general interest we should not forget that the Government of the United States rests upon the consent of the governed; that this is a government of the people, for the people, and by the people; and that the people established the Government that all might enjoy its blessings, and to secure this end legislation should be promotive of the greatest good of the greatest number. Each man is a sovereign, and is supposed to be capable of self-government and capable of acting in association with his neighbors, not only to advance his own interests, but the interests of others; and to do this each and all must bear alike the burdens, as well as share the blessings to result from the association thus formed.

The silver question, as it is called, affects the prosperity and happiness of every citizen, whatever his vocation, in every part of our great country. And as the people are acting through us, their representatives and agents, let us resolve to settle this question as the constituencies we represent may desire. Who are our constituents? Are the bondholders of Europe and their allies in the United States, who are the holders of the bonds of the United States and of the States, the national bankers, the gold-kings, and the lenders of money—are these our constituents, or do we represent all the people, the rich and the poor, those living luxuriously, and laborers in the fields, in mines, in shops, producers and consumers?

Who is demanding the suspension of the coinage of silver? Are the millions of laborers, men and women, who toil with their hands, finding few resting places in this life, and they who produce the cotton and the cereals, and dig from the earth coal, gold, silver, and other minerals, upon which all live, are these demanding the demonetization of silver or the suspension of its coinage? The answer comes up from every cotton, corn, and wheat field, and from every mine and workshop in the land, No; but the demand emanates from the bondholder, the national banker, and the money-lender. The questions to be settled by us, and they should be settled by this Congress, are, Shall the people's wishes be respected, and shall they govern this country, or shall the millionaires of Europe and their allies, the millionaires of this country, a few thousand in number, govern it?

Do you not know that a feeling exists, which is fast developing into a conviction, all over the country from Maine to California, among all classes of laborers and producers, and among the people generally, that the hard times, the increasing poverty of the masses, the suffering and distress that meet the eye wherever you look, result from the controlling influence of the money oligarchy in State Legislatures and in Congress? This conviction stifles hope and energy, it begets distrust, destroys love of country. Who can love a country that not only fails to give equal and just laws to all, but, instead, subsidizes a class with millions annually and yields a willing obedience to its selfish and tyrannical dictation?

The producers of the wealth of the country, though poor, are intelligent, and after years of toil and failure begin to understand why they fail, and why the few millionaires who neither toil nor spin fare sumptuously every day and are arrayed in purple and fine linen. These millions of laborers and producers must be respected and protected from the greed and rapacity of the few who wield the wealth of the nation by means of Government subsidies and by means of unjust class legislation, or strikes will continue and grow in magnitude and dignity, and the army of tramps that now marches through the country will become so large and dangerous that the military arm of the Government will be invoked and strengthened at great cost to the Treasury to protect life and property.

All questions of public policy should be adjusted with reference to "the greatest good to the greatest number." The silver question being one of public policy should be determined on this principle. We have a creditor class and debtor class. The debtor greatly exceeds in numbers the creditor class. To diminish the volume of the currency enhances its value, adds to the value of the creditor's securities, and in the same ratio lessens the ability of the debtor to pay by decreasing the value of his property and increasing the number of his hours of labor. The advocates of a single gold standard argue that to continue the coinage of silver and give it, as gold has, a legal-tender quality for all debts will be dishonest and unfair to the creditor, notwithstanding the debt was contracted to be paid in either gold or silver at the option of the debtor. This is absurd and needs no answer.

The next objection to the coinage of silver is, it has been demonetized in England, Germany, France, and other states in Europe which lessened the value of silver not only there but in this country, and as it is cheaper than gold, the more valuable coin will be hoarded or will be taken to the single gold standard countries in their commercial intercourse with the United States. This position is triumphantly answered by the official report of the Director of the Mint, furnished me on the 24th day of February, 1886, which states that since the partial remonetization of silver in 1878 the importation of gold into the country has greatly exceeded its exportation, and the exportation of silver has greatly exceeded the importation, although the bondholders and bankers predicted the contrary result. And from 1873, when silver was demonetized, till 1878, when it was remonetized, the exportation of gold was greatly in excess of its importation, and the exportation of silver for the same period exceeded its importation. Let the report speak for itself. One fact is worth a thousand arguments or assertions.

This report conclusively shows that both metals are necessary; that one is inadequate to meet the demands of the business of the country; that both metals having equal dignity in the currency will support each other and form a basis upon which the credit of the country can rest securely. If we should stop here and study this report we would be forced to conclude that the remonetization of silver in 1878 saved the credit of the country and averted calamities that are painful to contemplate.

But the stake is great. The money power has never failed, without reference to truth or its effects upon the general prosperity of the country, to achieve success, and triumphing now the millionaires will double their wealth, and the national banks will perpetuate their power. When silver is demonetized, and the greenbacks are called in, and that is part of the policy of the gold advocates, their places will be supplied by national-bank currency. The bonds of the United States are now worth from 16 to 24 per cent. premium. With the demonetization of silver and the withdrawal of the $346,000,000 of greenbacks from the currency, the bonds of the United States will never be paid, the national debt will be fostered as a blessing, and the bankers will be invested with the indestructible mastery of the country's fortunes.

But the question arises, Why, when the currency is exclusively gold coin and national-bank currency, will not the country be drained of its gold? Is it because gold is cheaper in Europe than our national-bank currency? If so, why? Gold as merchandise in the single gold-standard countries is worth a hundred cents in the dollar; no more, no less. It has intrinsic value. It is the standard of value. But national-bank currency is not worth the paper it is printed on without the guarantee of the United States that authorized its issuance. Can any man explain why the United States may not keep its silver coin at par with its gold coin as well as it can keep its non-interest-bearing greenback notes and national-bank currency at par with gold, which is the case now?

Foreign commerce requires comparatively little money. The productions of one country are exchanged for those of another. Commercial paper, checks, bills of exchange, and clearing-house balances have been substituted for money in commercial transactions and the balances paid in money are comparatively light. How can the country's condition or that of its commerce be improved by the demonetization of silver and substituting national currency? There is more value and worth in a standard silver dollar of 412½ grains, coined and stamped by the Government under legal authority, with full legal-tender functions in the payment of public and private debts, than can be given to a national-bank note by the Government. The silver dollar in England as bullion is worth 80 cents, and the bank note there would be worth nothing.

With all the efforts of the money-power in Europe and of this country, aided by Presidents and their Secretaries of the Treasury since the partial remonetization of silver in 1878, to depreciate its value, the standard silver dollar is still worth 100 cents. It buys gold dollar for dollar, it pays debts without discount, except the bonded debt of the United States, and it should be used to pay the bonds of the Government, according to the contract of the Government with the bondholders when the obligations were issued. It pays, or at least its representative pays, the salaries of all the officers in the Government from the President to the humblest official. Yet it is not an honest dollar. It is locked up in the vaults of the Treasury because the people do not want it, and its circulation can not be increased, the advocates of the single gold standard of value tell us. There would not now be a silver dollar in the vaults of the Treasury not represented by a certificate in circulation if the Secretary of the Treasury had not, by an order issued 1st November, 1881, stopped the exchange of the standard silver dollar or the silver certificate by the assistant treasurer at New York for gold coin or gold bullion. The Treasurer of the United States, in his report to Congress dated November 1, 1880, says:

> The demand for silver certificates, under the circular of the Department dated September 18, 1880, authorizing their exchange for gold coin and bullion, has been quite extensive at New Orleans, Saint Louis, Chicago, and Cincinnati; and there were paid out at these points during the month of October $3,485,000 in silver certificates for an equal amount of gold coin deposited in the subtreasury in New York.

And in December, 1881, the Secretary of the Treasury in his report says:

> The Department has issued silver certificates at the subtreasury offices upon a deposit of gold coin in like amount with the assistant treasurer at New York, and through this means certificates have been issued for nearly all the silver held by the Treasury. The certificates amount to about $66,000,000 and are now outstanding.

After this the Secretary exchanged silver certificates for gold coin, dollar for dollar, which swelled the amount of gold purchased with silver to $80,730,500. In January, 1885, the exchange of silver certificates ceased by order of the Treasurer. Why the purchase of gold with silver certificates was discontinued we are left to conjecture. The only reasonable conclusion is that the Department feared the balance of the silver or silver certificates would get into circulation. The bankers and even bondholders can not or should not complain; if the Treasury can purchase gold coin and bullion with silver or silver certificates, to accommodate them as a higher order of creditors, how can they complain or object to silver and insist upon its demonetization? Why should the Government be alarmed and insist upon "currency reform" by the demonetization of silver and the retirement of greenbacks?

The facts just stated, taken from the Treasurer's reports, do not establish the assertion "that there already exists a lack of confidence among the people touching 'our financial processes,'" if it is intended by this expression to convey the idea that the people had lost confidence in silver coin or silver certificates. But it is time that the people were alarmed and should begin to lose confidence in "our financial processes" when the failure to pay silver coin as well as gold coin to the creditors of the Government is persisted in. The bondholders and bankers hoard the gold, prvent its circulation, deprive the country of its use, contract the currency, and thereby extort more money from the laboring and producing classes. Laborers and producers do not hoard gold. They have it not to hoard. Pay the creditors of the Government in silver as well as gold, according to contract, and they will have less to hoard.

It is further objected that the Treasury has to pay out every month $2,000,000 in gold for two millions or more of silver dollars to be added to the idle mass already accumulated in the Treasury. Every ounce of silver bullion in the market or that has been put on the market since its remonetization could have been purchased by the United States with silver coin or silver certificates. If silver will and does purchase gold, dollar for dollar, and it takes gold to buy silver bullion, the parity of value between the two, gold and silver, is surely established—at least in the United States.

It is estimated that the national debts of civilized countries, excluding India, China, and Japan, are in round numbers $25,000,000,000 and the other indebtedness of the same countries is estimated to be several times the amount of the national debts, and that the entire bonded debt aggregates $75,000,000,000, and that this indebtedness is payable in gold or silver. It is also estimated that the total metallic currency amounts to $7,000,000,000, of which about half is gold and the other half is silver. The national debt of the United States, according to the report of the Treasurer on 31st day of December, 1885, was $1,843,713,715.80, of which $1,274,037,001.66 bears interest. The report of the Director of the Mint shows that on the 1st of July, 1885, the amount of coin in the country was about $820,000,000, of which $542,000,000 consisted of gold coin and $278,000,000 of silver coin. The gold and silver bullion in mints and assay offices on July 1, 1885, and available for coinage was $71,501,682. making the actual amount of coin and bullion in the country $892,500,519.

The domestic production of gold bullion on July 1, 1885, amounted to $31,584,436, and of silver bullion, same year, $32,250,044. The total coinage value of the gold and silver bullion purchased at the mints was $89,683,850. In addition to the gold coin and gold bullion and silver coin and silver bullion mentioned, the United States have in circulation in legal-tender Treasury notes (greenbacks), $346,000,000; and the 1st of November, 1885, there were twenty-seven hundred and twenty-seven national banks in existence, with their note circulation of $315,847,168, aggregating a grand total of about $1,500,000,000 of coin and paper currency in the United States. If we strike down silver as a legal tender in the payment of debts in the United States and reduce it to the status of merchandise and adopt the single gold standard, we need not refer to the opinions of political economists or great financiers to be informed that gold will appreciate in value and in its purchasing power just in proportion to the contraction of the currency caused by the withdrawal of silver from circulation. And if silver be demonetized it will be in order next to retire the $346,000,000 in greenbacks.

The same interest and influence that oppose silver demand the retirement of greenbacks. Will the overtaxed millions of laborers and producers consent? Will they submit patiently if it be done? The United States pay no interest on its silver or silver certificates, or on the greenbacks, yet they are as good as gold in the payment of all public or private debts, although greenbacks are not legally receivable for customs dues. The last report of the Treasurer shows that the New York customhouse received for the fiscal year 1885 United States legal-tender notes, $36,161,000. While the greenbacks make up part of the currency, yet they are only notes against the Government redeemable in coin. But the national banks would have silver retired, leaving only gold to redeem the greenbacks. The greenbacks and silver constitute nearly half of the currency of the country. The national banks, the creatures and agents of the United States, would continue to take from the people the $12,000,000 or $15,000,000 with which they are subsidized by the Government in the way of interest on the bonds they hold against the United States and upon which they pay no tax, and continue to dominate their creator, who is but the agent of the people, to the ruin and bankruptcy of millions of laborers and producers, and finally to the destruction of the liberties of the people.

The efforts to debase or to destroy the monetary quality of silver is a war of capital against labor, of the wrong against the right. We can not take lessons from Europe without injury to our system of government and without reducing the people to the pitiable condition of European laborers and paupers; neither will the brave, intelligent, liberty-loving people of this country long submit to a policy that imposes such conditions. We want no lords or princes in this country. We want to encourage our people of all classes to attain, if possible, a higher standard of manhood. One step in that direction, enabling them to make further progress in social, moral, and intellectual elevation, is taken when an ample and sufficient gold and silver and paper currency is conceded by the Goverhment. We have not a sufficiency of money now in circulation to secure the best results in our interstate commerce, in the transactions between individuals of the same State and between individuals of the different States and Territories.

The United States contains a population approximating 60,000,000 souls. Its climate and soil are attracting hundreds of thousands of people annually from other countries. This fair land can produce all comforts and luxuries in such vast volume that even proximate estimates are impossible. It can supply with homes and give employment to ten times its present population. Our productions are varied from climatic causes. The people of one section supply those of other sections with their surplus. But this internal commerce is not carried on like foreign commerce, by barter, the exchange of one article for another. The medium of exchange is money. People of one section buy what they need from the people of another or different locality, always in each transaction paying money. Home markets can not be made successful, and stimulate production and yield profits to the people without money.

The more money the people have the more they will buy of food and clothing and commodities. The demand for the products of labor compensates the laborer and encourages increased production, and when the producer and consumer are both benefited the ultima thule of human government has been attained. And one of the necessary steps to be taken to secure this desideratum is the provision of a sound and an abundant currency. Mankind, from the days of Abraham, the father of the faithful, whose money was shekels of gold and shekels of silver, through all the centuries intervening between that time and the present, have made gold and silver their currency and the basis of their currency when they could get them. France has a population little greater than half that of the United States, within territorial limits less than those of one of our States, with few exports of the productions of the soil, she has gold and silver, and paper money redeemable in gold and silver, greatly in excess of the currency of the United States.

Mr. Burchard, the Director of the Mint, on the 20th of June, 1885, reported that France had in gold coin and gold bullion $848,000,000 and in silver coin and silver bullion $595,000,000. These sums aggregate $1,443,000,000, an amount of gold and silver nearly equal to the entire currency of the United States consisting of gold coin and gold bullion, silver coin and silver bullion, greenbacks and United States currency. In addition to her gold and silver France had $574,675,197 of outstanding notes of the Bank of France, and her gold and silver and bank notes were at par and all legal tender. The statesmen and financiers and people of France do not think she has too much money. The population of France is thrifty and energetic. We have facts enough to justify the conclusion that the demonetization of silver or the suspension of its coinage involves a contraction of the currency, which is now not half enough, and it will bring about results in our home markets in interstate commerce, in the shrinkage of values in real and personal property, that will utterly ruin the debtor classes, paralyze business, and fill the land with poverty, distress, and crime.

The writings of great political economists, historians, and statesmen tell of and deplore the contraction of the currency by the demonetization of silver and the adoption of the single gold standard of value. Leon Fouchet said in 1843:

If all the nations of Europe adopted the system of Great Britain, the price of gold would be raised beyond measure, and we should see produced in Europe a result lamentable enough. The Government can not decree that legal tender shall be only gold, in place of silver, for that would be to decree a revolution, and the most dangerous of all, because it would be a revolution leading to unknown results.

In a memoir read before the French Institute in 1868, M. Wolowski said:

The suppression of silver would bring on a veritable revolution. Gold would augment in value with rapid and constant progress, which would break the faith of contracts and aggravate the situation of all debtors including the nation. It would add at one stroke of the pen at least three milliards to the twelve milliards of the public debt.

In 1869, Rothschild, the great financier, as a member of the monetary commission appointed by the French Government, said:

The actual state of things—that is to say, the simultaneous employment of the two precious metals—is satisfactory, and gives rise to no complaints. They now demand that silver should be demonetized as fifteen years ago they demanded that gold should be. In fact, whether gold or silver dominates for the time being it is always true that the two metals concur together in forming the monetary circulation of the world, and it is the general mass of the two metals combined which serves as the measure of the value of things.

Alexander Hamilton, in his report to Congress in 1791 upon the subject of the mint, said:

To annul the use of either of the metals as money is to abridge the quantity of circulating medium, and is liable to all the objections which arise from a comparison of the benefits of a full with the evils of a scanty circulation.

Mr. Jefferson, who was a member in General Washington's Cabinet with Mr. Hamilton, in 1792 wrote to Mr. Hamilton:

I return you the report on the mint. I concur with you that the mint must stand on both metals.

At the international monetary conference held at Paris in 1881, ex-Senator Allen G. Thurman, an unselfish patriot and profound statesman, after fully investigating the subject, said:

I believe that bimetallism will ultimately prevail; for I can not see how the vast structure of credit, the most distinguishing feature of modern industry and commerce, can be supported on a gold basis alone. With both metals its base has often been found too narrow, but with one it would be, to my apprehension, positively unsafe.

I have given you the opinions of some of the greatest men of the times in which they lived and acted as to the wisdom of keeping both gold and silver as the standards of value, and as to the effect of contraction which would necessarily follow the retirement of silver as money. We can not forget the financial troubles that followed the demonetization of silver in this country in 1873. The United States produces nearly one-half of the silver produced in the world. We should encourage its production, re-enthrone and give it equal dignity with gold as money, as a standard of value and as a full legal tender for all debts, public and private.

But it is feared by the gold advocates that the United States will be a great reservoir into which Europe will empty her despised and dishonored silver. Can this be, as long as we control the mints and can prescribe rules for their government as to coinage and the character of bullion to be coined? We can use our mints only for the coinage of silver bullion produced in the United States. The United States is big enough to stand alone. We have the richest country in the world. We now produce everything that our people require for food and clothing except sugar, coffee, and tropical fruits, and they are produced in silver-standard countries near our borders, which we can get in exchange for products of the United States. Why should we not adopt an American policy suited to the wants of the people of our own country and that is consistent with our peculiar system of government?

In this country the people sustain a very different relation to the Government from that which the people of European states sustain to their governments. In this country the people govern; in Europe the people are governed and kept in subordination by large standing armies, and are oppressed with taxes imposed partly to sustain the agency of their enslavement. Our people produce a large surplus of cotton, corn, wheat, pork, and beef. The United States produce 45 per cent. of the precious metals of the world. Wells, Fargo & Co. report the gold and silver product of the United States for the five years ending December 31, 1884, to have been $145,244,551 gold and $215,658,033 silver. Of the $145,244,551, gold, at least one-third, or $48,441,267, was extracted from silver-bearing ores that never would have been mined had it not been for their richness in silver. If silver coinage is stopped, the gold supply from this source will also stop.

The credit of the United States is as good as that of any country even in a state of progressive development, when most of the civilized countries have attained their full growth in greatness and are annually sending thousands of their populations to this country for employment and the means of living.

The balance of trade is in our favor, and will continue so if our agricultural and mining products should be emancipated from hindering tariffs and efforts to dishonor silver. Wisdom and experience demand that the United States should regulate the volume of currency and not give the power to individuals or soulless corporations to do it, and that the supply of currency should be full and ample, consisting of gold and silver, and paper convertible into coin on the demand of the holder. The United States have the ability to do it. France and other countries achieve the result without half the resources and little more than half the population of the United States.

A national debt is a national calamity. National banks can, as they have done and will do again when they can profit by it, contract or expand the currency, depress values, add Black Fridays to the calendar of crime and disgrace the country that permits them to exist. The United States should pay her debts in gold or silver as the one or the other may be the cheaper or more convenient, and with the payment of her indebtedness we will get rid of national banks and their currency, and save the people millions of dollars expended annually as interest.

If the United States can sustain national-bank currency at par with gold there will be no trouble to replace it with Treasury notes redeemable in gold and silver, and by the free coinage of silver as well as gold. Then the people will govern and not be governed. The United States will then have her New York the peer of England's London to fix prices on the productions of the country. England now controls the price of silver and is stimulating the productions of wheat and cotton in India by exchanging silver, which she has depreciated, for her cotton and wheat and thereby forced down the price of American cotton and wheat. England is speculating in silver, making great gains for herself and developing the resources of her Indian colonies to the great injury of our great staples. And our money kings who are in sympathy with the money lords and princes of Europe are contributing their powerful influence here to make silver still cheaper, regardless of the prostrating effect that it will have and is having upon agriculture and labor in this country.

I will repeat, agriculture is the basis of our prosperity. Our true policy is to encourage it and protect the millions who are engaged in it. The hardy sons of toil should not longer be left to the tender mercies of the powerful money kings and corporations who control the prices of labor and the products of labor to their enrichment and to the greater impoverishment of the producer and laborer. The producers and laborers number millions. The Shylocks are comparatively few in number. They can perish and the world will not be poorer, nor will virtue and patriotism disappear. But not so with the millions of laborers and producers. Goldsmith said truly:

> Princes and lords may flourish or may fade,
> A breath can make them, as a breath hath made;
> But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
> When once destroyed can never be supplied.

[Applause.]

The people's will should be done. They demand a full and abundant metallic currency, consisting of gold and silver, and paper redeemable with coin. And to secure it to them silver should be restored to the place it occupied in the currency before the misfortunes of the Government enabled its selfish creditors to dishonor it. To suspend the coinage of silver is tantamount to demonetizing it. Gold and silver are found together in the mines. They have been used as money by civilized nations through all time; even the Son of Man used silver to pay tribute to Cæsar. Let us honor God by using every provision He has made for the good of man, and the people will be prosperous and happy again. [Great applause.]

Mr. JONES, of Texas (at the conclusion of his remarks), said: If I have any time remaining I yield it to my friend from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] is entitled to the floor for twenty minutes.

PENSIONS TO SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have nothing to say on the great question of silver coinage, except that I am in favor of the unlimited coinage of silver and gold.

I rose for another purpose. I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read as part of my speech a bill which I have introduced to pension the soldiers of the Mexican war.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 607) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the names of all the surviving officers, soldiers, and sailors who enlisted and served in the war with Mexico for any period during the years 1845, 1846, 1847, and 1848, and were honorably discharged, and their surviving widows, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, from and after the passage of this act, during their lives.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry this act into effect: Provided, That where it shall appear that a discharge is lost, secondary evidence may be permitted; and where it shall appear an applicant has received a land-warrant, that shall be sufficient evidence of an honorable discharge, unless the evidence shows that he procured it by fraud.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Chairman, this bill is perhaps the first pension bill ever introduced into the Congress of the United States that ignored on its face the existence of a civil war. It proposes to grant pensions for services in the Mexican war regardless of anything that may have happened since; and as the Supreme Court has decided in the case of the three months' pay, the benefits of this bill will go to all sections alike. Every soldier who served in the Mexican war will under this bill receive a pension of $8 a month.

This is a very small compensation for the great amount of good that the services of these soldiers brought the country, even in a pecuniary point of view. The wages of our private soldiers in the Mexican war were only $7 a month, and were therefore not equal to the pay that has since been granted by the enactment of the Congress of the United States for similar services. These old men, for most of them are now old, served their country in a foreign land. The endured hardships and privations. They endured them as one people, coming from the North and the South, from the East and the West, with one object in their hearts—to obey their country's call, to vindicate their country's honor, and protect the rights of their fellow-citizens.

In what I am about to say I feel that I am approaching ground that is not popular; I feel that I am about to place myself in opposition to a prejudice which strongly prevails in some quarters. But I wish to speak particularly about a determination on the part of the Committee on Pensions, to which I belong, to spoil what I consider to be the harmony of this bill. My distinguished friend [Mr. ELDREDGE] who sits beside me, the chairman of our committee, himself an excellent soldier and a man of great ability, has proposed, and the majority of the committee have agreed with him, to put upon that bill an amendment providing that persons under political disability shall not draw a pension under the bill.

Now, I want to ask my Union friends—and certainly I think I am a Union man, and I have shown myself as much in favor of pensions as any man ought to be—I wish to ask my Union friends, why should you, after a cooling time of more than twenty years, still show your hatred toward your Southern brother? When everybody is rejoicing that we are one country and one people, when everybody is looking forward to our great advancement in wealth and everything that can make us grand and glorious, when everybody is rejoicing in the universal Union sentiment that pervades in our land from one end of it to the other, why should you say, "There is a little wormwood and gall that we can not get rid of?" That is not according to the history of human nature. I have probed this thing. I have endeavored, so help me God, in thinking about it to look at every side of the case that promised me any light.

I have probed the thing. When I ask a brother Union soldier, or a man zealous in the Union cause, "Why do you want that in it?" he says, "Well I can forget everybody and everything else," and I speak plainly, "but Jefferson Davis; I can not forget him." Why what is the matter with you? Why can you not forget? Is not every man who entered the confederate army, who understood its purport and meaning, just in the same position, and has he not done exactly what Jefferson Davis did, attempt to divide the Government? Have you concentrated your hate so as to hurl it all upon one man's head? Is there so much gall in your soul—and I am speaking now to my distinguished and kind-hearted friend from Pennsylvania, Mr. BROWN—is there that much gall in your soul that you want to concentrate it all upon a personal given object and vent it all upon him to the exclusion of the rest of mankind, and thus dry up the abundant source, the glorious source, of brotherhood and brotherly love flowing into every heart throughout the length and breadth of this land? Why do you want to do it? But I want to talk a moment about this.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me a word, if it will not interrupt him too much?

Mr. WOLFORD. Well, I have no objection, if I can get time to finish my speech.

Mr. REAGAN. I only wanted to say that my friend from Mississippi, Colonel SINGLETON, read upon the floor of the House several years ago—five or six years ago—a letter from Jefferson Davis, when a bill was pending to pension the soldiers of the Mexican war, stating that he had been entitled to a pension from the time the bill was passed to pension the wounded and invalid soldiers of the Mexican war but he never felt it necessary to ask the Government for it; and he would prefer that his name should be excepted from any bill passed for the benefit of the soldiers, so that it should not stand in the way of the Government doing justice to his comrades in arms.

Mr. WOLFORD. If Jefferson Davis, rising above the ordinary grade of mankind, was so noble as to resign his pension for the sake of his fellow-soldiers in Mexico and was willing that he should be singled out as an individual never to be allowed a pension or any consideration for his services, I hope to be no less magnanimous. I will be no less magnanimous than he is, and because he has done so I am so much the more in favor of putting in his name. [Laughter.]

But I remember, and I want to talk a little about it because my friend here, the chairman of the committee is a very powerful man; he beat me in the committee and I fear he will beat me in the House, but I shall vote for it without that provision in it, although I am opposed to leaving it out.

But I want to call back the attention of my friends upon this floor to a little bit of history, and it happened to be a little history in which I was personally interested, for I took part in it. When I was a young man in a foreign country we were fighting in Mexico at a place called Buena Vista (or Fair View, which is the meaning of it in the English language.) We could see away up the valley; we had got that far into the Mexican country in our advance upon the Mexican capital. We had about four thousand effective men and were surrounded by the army of one of the most celebrated generals of the Mexican Government, General Santa Anna, who thought it would be easy work with his twenty-odd thousand men, inclosing us in every direction, to capture the little band of American invaders. I remember in that fight that one of our regiments, overpowered by a ferocious charge, a brave and gallant regiment, commanded by Colonel Bowles, of Indiana, left the field, and I remember at that critical time that we were forming a line to resist the attack of the Mexican lancers. We were in a critical condition indeed. I saw some soldiers away up in the valley who were coming toward our rear and others coming toward us in every direction. Suddenly we found that we were surrounded. Shortly afterward I heard the clear ring of a rifle, then a volley, then another. I turned to my regimental colonel, who died that day, Colonel Clay, son of the great Clay, and asked, "Who is that?" His reply was, "It is Jefferson Davis with the Mississippi Rifles;" and I remember how Miñon and his lancers retreated before the powerful volleys of the Mississippi Rifles, commanded by Colonel Davis, and I remember when they left the field a little afterward we were fearfully engaged in a great contest to liberate the great John Harding, of Illinois, who had gone too far in a charge following the retreating Mexicans and had been surrounded.

Our colonel, McKee, fell dead and was carried off the field; our lieutenant-colonel, Henry Clay, was killed; but victory was ours. I remember after the battle we brought the dead bodies and laid them down before General Taylor's marquee and there wept over our dead, for Kentucky was almost literally massacred in that fight. While mourning over our dead, with hearts full and beating but still feeling pride in the result, for glorious victory was ours, I remember hearing General Taylor say to his adjutant-general, Major Bliss, to go and call Jefferson Davis to come to him. He came at once while we were standing there and General Taylor met him. That was the first time I had ever seen Mr. Davis. General Taylor said to him, "My daughter is a better judge of men than I am. Henceforth your gallant conduct in saving our army makes you entitled to be my son, and I forgive you."

I understood there had been a difficulty about a marriage. But Davis was then considered a patriot. Davis was then considered a hero, and everybody acknowledged and history acknowledges the fact that that gallant man at that particular critical moment saved our army, saved us from surrender. And what effect it had upon the war all men conversant with history know. At that time Davis, that great man, stood with the Mississippi Rifles and turned the tide of victory against a superior, overwhelming force, with his heart beating for the success of the American cause, a lover of the Union, a lover of the flag. Are we to say to him that because you did wrong in after years, because you attempted to revolutionize our Government and divide our country and make two sections of it, we will put on the record that we owe you a spite, that you can never be forgiven?

I, sir, have nothing to forgive in Jefferson Davis. He did as an honest man what he believed to be right. But I look upon him not as Davis, the president of the southern confederacy, for I forgive all that. I put it behind me when the war was over. I did not wait, as I heard a distinguished gentleman say in the Fitz-John Porter debate, I did not wait ten years for cooling time. God knows I was cool enough when the war was over. [Laughter.] When it was all over I forgave the men we had been fighting. I have looked upon Jefferson Davis as a great man, who saved our army in Mexico and who saved the country. Now, you tell me I ought to agree to say with you that I never forgive and never forget that there is one place on earth as well as in another region where forgiveness never comes, and that is the American Congress. [Laughter.]

I want to say to gentlemen who feel in that way that the people are ahead of you. I want to say truthfully, candidly, and kindly to my distinguished friend, the chairman of our committee, that the people have forgiven Jefferson Davis. He is now a citizen paying taxes, obedient to the Government, honoring and loving it, although he does not ask an office, although he does not ask a pension. It is for you and your children that I speak more than for Jefferson Davis. He is but one man. He will be remembered by every man who was in the Texan war as one who loved his country and as a gallant man. And I want to say to you here and now that it is for your sakes I ask that you shall not put on the records of the American Congress a declaration of spite; that you shall not legislate for vengeance, but that you will show that you legislate as true patriots and as true statesmen ought to legislate—upon a high and elevated plane, looking to the future glory and the future honor of our country as blessing after blessing will flow to it.

But, sir, I believe I have said all I want to say against that amendment. I do appeal to you as lovers of your country, and lovers of your children, and of your own and your country's reputation, for your vote will be recorded—I do appeal to each of you not to say, "I will let the spite I owe to one man mar the beauty of a bill that ignores the existence of a civil war." I appeal to you for your good and your country's good and advantage, not particularly for Jefferson Davis.

I want to say a few other things in connection with this subject. Jefferson Davis needs no vindication from me. His history stands out before the world, and is known and read of all men. But I do not want to put him in the enviable position that it shall be considered that he was so pure and bright that even malice and spite could find no other mode of assailing him than this. If you feel like putting that spite upon record, do you think your constituents will vindicate you? I will tell you who will not vindicate you. Future generations that read that record will not. For the time is coming fast, and coming powerfully, when there will be but one feeling on this subject—the feeling that we are all one people, with one heart and one soul and one hope of future glory, and we will be united.

I want to say another thing on this subject. I want to go a little further with reference to this Mexican pension bill. I have heard it suggested that it would cost a heap of money. It will cost only about a million dollars.

A MEMBER. More than that.

Mr. WOLFORD. I would not care if it should cost $10,000,000. Even then I would support it with all my heart.

This is strictly a service pension. It is for the service these men did their country, making their country rich by the results of that war. You ask me, are you for a service pension to the Union soldier? Here I would say to my friend from Texas, who thinks we are seeking to empty the Treasury, I am a strict economist, one who will contend that we ought to pay all our debts. But we ought to do everything that policy and interest and principle demand for our soldiers. I am for a service pension all the way round everywhere, as well as for invalid pensions. You tell me it will break up the credit of the country. Stop a minute; I want the attention of my Southern brethren.

You pay a good deal of taxes, and I honor you for the way you have voted pensions for the United soldiers. God knows what we would do if the case were the other way, if all the money went to you and none of it to us; we might be selfish. [Laughter.] But you vote pensions with a magnanimity that has astonished me. And I want to say to the country here and now, to the credit of our Southern brethren, that they have come up with the love of the Union, and the love of the soldiers, and the love of liberty, and the love of the country in their hearts, and have voted pensions freely to the very men they fought.

Mr. REAGAN. We have voted the full estimates of the Department every time.

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, sir; they have voted the full amount called for by the Department every time, and they have done it nobly. In doing that they have had to do what the men of the North have not been called upon to do, they have had to vote pensions to the men they fought during the war, and they have done it, and done it cheerfully. Therefore, sir, in my judgment this cry ought to be stopped, that men who act such a noble part in this matter are not worthy to be trusted.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ROBERTSON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] state how much time he desires?

Mr. WOLFORD. I want about fifteen minutes more, if I can have it.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the time of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WOLFORD] will be extended as requested.

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLFORD. I thank the committee, and we will put the time at twenty minutes for fear I might not have enough. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, having answered that proposition, and answered it in a way that I think no Union man can object to, I want to go on and throw a little further light upon this question. My friend from Texas—and if there is any man that I admire for his candor and his boldness and his nobility and his great judgment it is my distinguished friend Mr. REAGAN—my friend asks, "When will this thing stop?" Well, sir, I will tell you when I am willing to have it stop, and I want your attention: When every soldier of all our wars has had a disability pension, if he is sick or wounded and a service pension for the service he has rendered to his country, then I am willing this thing should stop, but not until then. [Laughter.] But gentlemen say, "We shall never be able to pay it," and they say we have rivers to clean out——

A MEMBER. And harbors to build.

Mr. WOLFORD. Yes, Mr. Chairman, rivers to clean out and harbors to build, and I am for all that [laughter]; and you have the tariff to reduce, and I am for that, too. But gentleman say, "Where will you get all the money?"

I see the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means here, and I know that he and his committee have sense enough to get the money. [Laughter.] I have no fears about that. Even if it should happen that they should have to lay a tax upon the income of the rich men who made fortunes by following our Army while our soldiers were suffering; even if that should come to pass they will be able to provide the money. I do not want to dictate to them how they shall raise it, but I say that if you make the law they will find the money.

And now, sir, let me state distinctly what I want. I want our rivers, all of them, cleaned out so as to give us cheap transportation. I want our Navy to be built up again; I want the flag of America to float once more over American bottoms with all the honor and all the glory that it ever had. I want our Army supported. I want all these things done, and it will take a good deal of money to do them all, and then I want justice done to our soldiers, and that will take a heap of money. [Laughter.] I want all these things done, sir, and now I want to submit a suggestion or two as to the means of doing them. Remember that all this money is not to be paid out in a day. Even if you should pass this law now you could not get in the applications for a good while. I am afraid you will not pass it now. [Laughter.] I do not expect to come to Congress any more, but I want to see all these things done, and unless you go to work and do them I may be tempted to run again. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I want all our debts paid. I want to pay all the debts we owe the South, the cotton tax and everything else. I want to pay every individual what we owe him, and then I want to pension all the soldiers. [Renewed laughter.] I want to make a clean record for the nation. Do you tell me that will take a vast amount of money? Yes, sir, it will. I do not deny that; but how are we going to raise that money? Well, sir, we have about sixty millions of freemen who will raise it for us. We have a country growing rich from day to day. I know it will require some financial skill to furnish the money for the first few payments, but in the mean time the wealth of the country will be continually increasing. Gradually, yearly, daily, hourly, the wealth of this country has been increasing for years, and so it will increase, as I hope and pray and expect, for all time to come. Do not you gentlemen expect that? Is not that your anticipation of American progress and American thrift and American glory? Is not that what you expect to be worked out by the free, enterprising, shove-ahead power of the American people? Yes, sir. Our country will grow richer and richer from day to day, while the soldiers who are drawing pensions will grow fewer and fewer. Fifty years from now they will all have been paid in full and the country will be richer than ever. That is not a long time to take to pay off a great national debt.

I hope the Democrats will be in power then to pay it [laughter], but whoever is in power I want the debt paid. Even in ten years from now the number of pensioners will have fallen off immensely, and in the same time the wealth of the country will have grown immensely. Consider that brethren. Consider that you are legislating for all time. You are legislating to establish a principle and a precedent that will be an honor to you and to your children forever. Why, sir, I could not bear to think of my country in any other character; I could not bear to think of her otherwise than as the champion and the exemplar of everything that is honest and honorable and pure. We have a right to hope, and I do hope, that during the next fifty years we shall have no war to trouble us, but if we should have a war "sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof;" and one thing you may rely upon, we shall have a united country to fight it. I want every soldier that has served his country and has become disabled to have a pension for service and a pension for his disability. I do not go with my friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] in his doctrine, that nobody should be pensioned unless he was shot. I go upon the idea that we are to do justice to all our people, and, above all things, to the soldiers that served their country.

What more do you want? One man said to me, "Why, I believe you would be for pensioning the rebel soldiers." Well, all the rebel soldiers who fought in the war with Mexico I do want to pension. I think nothing less would be just. These men say to us, "We are poor." God knows they are. They say, "Our country has been ravaged by war." God knows that is true. But say some of our Union men, "It is right for the Southern people to help to pay the taxes to provide pensions for the Union soldiers." But what about those poor fellows whom we on the Union side wounded? I intend to introduce a bill next Monday—and I avow it—to give to every soldier of the confederate army who lost a leg or an arm by our bullets or by anything that we did, an artificial leg or an artificial arm at the expense of the Government. I want my Union friends to reflect whether that would not be right. They vote pensions to the soldiers that were wounded by the bullets of the other side; and we say it is right. Now, let us do something for the soldiers that we wounded. I think that is fair play. Though they were standing under different colors, though the great flag of the Union that I have loved from boyhood did not wave over them, although they did not claim its protection, yet as they have now come back and are loving and honoring that flag I can not say to the poor soldier of the Mexican war, "We have taken your money for taxes on cotton and other things and you are suffering and in need, but we will not pay you back anything." I can not say to them, "We will not do you justice; we will not let any money circulate in your community." Such treatment of them is not in my heart. I abhor the very idea of such a course of legislation.

I tell you, gentlemen, that a long way in advance of this Congress stand the Union soldiers and the Union officers. I have had correspondence with them; I have received numerous letters that I intend some day to lay before Congress, and I feel justified in saying that twenty different Union soldiers within my knowledge who are now drawing pensions from the Government are giving the money to confederate soldiers. I say the Union officers and soldiers stand in advance of you. They are willing to support legislation which will say to these men that they shall not suffer.

But you say, "We must not give a pension to a man who does not love the country." Of course not; but do you suppose there is anybody now who does not love his country? Do you suppose that any man who was brave enough to fight does not now love this country of ours?

I read in the Bible when I was a boy that the Saviour once put this case to a certain pharisee who had peculiar notions: A man forgave to one debtor a great amount, and to another debtor a small amount; and the question was which of these debtors loved him most. The force and justice of the conclusion were evident; and the reply was "the man who received the most." So it is in this case. If you would be magnanimous and generous to these men, if you would make upon this question a history that will be a bright and glorious monument to you when you are dead, you will say to the wounded confederate soldier, "We will give you an arm, we will give you a leg." I do not care how far you go in that direction. I do not want to be misunderstood on that proposition. I am making no demagogue speech. I think everybody will agree with me on that. [Laughter.] I do not care how far you go in that direction.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. You do not care, I suppose, if we give each of them two legs.

Mr. WOLFORD. Certainly not, if they need them. I want to see all the wounds of the war healed; I want to see all sections of this country restored to harmony. I want to see the Union soldier love his country because his country loves him and gives unmistakable evidence of that love. I want to see the confederate soldier love his country because that country, forgiving any wrong that may have been done, loves him. He is "bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh." He is a part of this great country. He has a heart that beats in unison with yours in loving the flag.

The savage Indian has been bountied and pensioned, although he has fought the Government, scalped your men, and misused your women. He is the ward of the Government and receives its bounty. But, great heavens, we can not do anything for our brethren. We can do everything for the Indian; we can be kind to him; we can love him; we can show our love by unmistakable evidences. But we can not love our brother, although it is claimed the Union is to be restored in heart, in feeling, in soul. Now, gentlemen, do you not think you are going too far? Do you not think you are going in the wrong direction?

But you say, "We want to vindicate the American arms." Why, sir, the American arms have vindicated themselves everywhere. They need no vindication from you. Their history is known of all men. And the confederate arms have vindicated themselves; they need no vindication from you.

But it is in behalf of what I concede to be true policy, true manhood, and true statesmanship that I appeal for the Union soldier, and for the confederate soldier, and for everybody else who lives under this prosperous and beneficent Government. They live harmoniously and prosperously because they live with a deep consciousness of its justice. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am reminded of a notable thing in the history of our country, going way back to the days of the Revolution. I had forgotten it for years, and it has only just come again into my memory. I am reminded, sir, that after that terrible struggle through which our forefathers fought for the purpose of gaining our independence, that after the Revolution had been accomplished, after the trials and tribulations and dangers of that day, just so soon as our free Government was successfully started on its career of honor and glory, the cries of hate engendered in that Revolution of Tories and Whigs were forgotten. At one time those party cries had led men into conflict and were followed by blood and devastation, and yet, when peace was restored, they were restored. The words, "Whig" and "Tory," are not to be found anywhere in the Constitution, and I thank God for it. It was a manifestation of the magnanimity and statesmanship of our forefathers. Everybody was able to hold office, no matter where they had fought, with the British against us, or with our own people for independence. They were united and harmonious, and moved right along under the blessings of God. Whigs and Tories alike, at the very beginning, were elected to State Legislatures and to Congress. Whig boys married Tory girls, and Tory boys married Whig girls. [Applause.] And let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that this thing of marrying and giving in marriage will go right on whether you go on or not. [Great laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. WOLFORD. Very well; I think I have expired too. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I believe in this Government: I believe in the American people; I believe in honest, good, old-fashioned Anglo-Saxon English; I believe in denouncing wrong wherever it is found to exist, and in upholding the right though sensitive natures are disturbed by the effort; I believe the past is worth remembering, and the sacrifices made for an imperiled nation are worthy of commemoration. Believing this, Mr. Chairman, I presume to address this House at this time with some trepidation, as this is largely an era of cant; an era of "peace and good-will;" an era in which the blunders of the administration are to be condoned and its crimes forgotten and forgiven; an era in which nothing is to be said of the past, and an era in which the only man of the present to be impaled upon the panels of public opinion and denounced as a wrongdoer is the man who by industry and toil, guided by intelligence and excellent judgment, has accumulated property and is the fortunate possessor of more than the majority of his neighbors.

To this era it is difficult to adjust myself. But the interests involved in this silver discussion and in the practices of this national Democratic administration are so vital to my constituents, are so far-reaching and important to us as a people, that I avail myself without further apology of the privilege of submitting a few suggestions to the consideration of this body. In section 8, article 2 of the Constitution of the United States we find many of the enumerated powers given to Congress; and in paragraph 5 of such section authority is given "to coin money, regulate the value thereof and of foreign coin and fix the standard of weights and measures," and no duty that is imposed upon this legislative body is more important than that given by this paragraph of our organic law and no duty has been attended with more difficulties or embarrassments. It is a power possessed by every civilized government of the world, and one of the highest and most necessary acts of sovereignty. It would be interesting, and yet perhaps not profitable to this discussion, to review the history of the nations of the world in this particular and observe how speculative and experimental legislation has been, and how natural laws and the conditions of the people have greatly dominated in matters of finance.

We would find in such review that at some time in the world's history almost everything had been used for money or as the medium of barter and exchange. In the days of the Cæsars land was used as a cumbersome and burdensome medium of exchange, and as late as the Norman Conquest we find the people of England bartering and conducting their business and commercial transactions with "living" and "dead money"—the "living money" consisting of cattle and slaves, and the "dead money" of the coins and metals in use among the people. But the first recorded account of a purchase and sale was with silver, when Abraham bought of Ephron the field of Machpelah for a burial place for Sarah, his wife, and "paid 400 sheckles of silver, current money with the merchant," and from the earliest historical period silver has been the common medium of exchange and used by every country having a metallic currency.

In the days of William the Conqueror the pound "sterling" was designated as the standard money of England and represented an actual pound of silver, and from that time until 1717 silver was the sole standard of value and the principal money with which England fought her battles, paid her soldiers, developed her industries, educated her children, widened her commerce, extended her power, and became the proud and imperious nation of the eighteenth century. In that year Sir Isaac Newton reformed the mint and provided for the unrestricted and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver and gave to each full legal-tender qualities, and this continued the law of England until 1797, when the free coinage of silver was suspended, the coins outstanding, however, remaining full legal tender if of full weight. With the suspension of the coinage of silver came the suspension of cash and specie payments, and for twenty-four years the Bank of England enjoyed the substantial control and monopoly of furnishing through its bank notes the circulating medium of the United Kingdom.

In 1821 specie payments were resumed, and from that time until the present gold has been the single standard in Great Britain, except as the Bank of England in 1844, by act of 7 and 8 Victoria, was permitted to hold 25 per cent. of its reserve in silver. In our own country we find that wampum, codfish, tobacco, and many articles have been used as mediums of exchange, but that at all times the silver dollar, when obtainable by the people, was the popular representative of value and the common medium of barter and sale. In fact it is no disparagement to gold to say that the silver dollar has been longer known, more widely used, more extensively circulated, and is more familiar to mankind than any other coin of either metal.

In 1785 it was adopted by the American Congress as "the unit of account," Mr. Jefferson recommending it because it was "familiar to the minds of the people;" and in 1792 its coinage was provided for, and the American dollar of 371¼ grains of pure silver came to stay; and from that day to this it has been a full legal tender for all obligations, and yet we are told they are dishonest dollars. When they became such and why I shall be glad to have elucidated during this debate. From our first coinage act in 1792 to the present the debts of our country, governmental, State, municipal, corporate, and individual, have been contracted with the solemn assurance in the law that they might be paid in silver dollars. In fact, for more than a half century this could not have been otherwise. We were without gold, and silver dollars were our only dollars; and until 1849 there was not a bondholder or banker in New York or elsewhere who had ever seen a gold dollar, and I think I am within the figures when I say there are twenty-five million people in the United States to-day who never saw one at any time.

The silver dollar had been staunch and honest; with it the colonial debts were paid and the obligations of the young Republic, contracted in the war of the Revolution, discharged; with it Great Britain was beaten in 1812 and 1813, and our armies sustained in 1846–'47–'48 when carving from the domain of Mexico that vast empire which has contributed so much to our greatness and power and made the golden eagles of America possible; with it we have secured our wonderful growth and development; by its kindly presence our arts and sciences have grown, our people have been educated and thrift and contentment secured for them in a higher order than ever before known in the history of governments. Yet in an evil hour the Congress of the United States listened to the siren voice of the tempter and in 1873 dishonored American silver. With the hand of stealth it closed the doors of the mints of the Government and said to the hand of labor, "Mine no more silver, as the imprint of the nation shall not be given to the product of your industry and your toil." And it did this when the silver dollar was worth more than gold, and when unfriendly European governments were saying we must go down to death in consequence of the immense debt put upon us by a slave-holders' rebellion.

The German Empire two years before enacted a statute demonetizing silver, and the Latin Union, frightened by the warfare of Germany upon silver in 1874, refused it free coinage and provided for only a limited coinage at the mints of the union, and the Scandinavian states in 1876, yielding to the pressure of the monometallists, demonetized it and took away its legal-tender properties. The period of depression that followed this legislation is known to all. Every nation experienced it, and the wretchedness, the squalor, the want, the misery, the suffering, and the days of agony, and the weeks of hunger experienced by thousands in every realm, remind us of a period that God grant may never come to us again. But it is and will be argued that this period of depression, of stagnation, of retrogression, of misery and want may be ascribed to other causes than the demonetization of silver. Grant it; and yet what were they? What single cause contributed to it so much as this unwise, unhealthful legislation?

Some gentlemen will say the balance of trade was against us during that period. Ah, gentlemen, you forget that this stagnation, this period of depression, was universal. Was the balance of trade against all the world? And is it not a most remarkable fact that this cloud of gloom, of despondency, of depression, of "balance of trade" followed at once in the wake of this legislation against silver, and continued at high tide in our own land until 1878, when Congress, in obedience to the demand of the great heart of the American people, again opened the doors of our mints in part to the metal dishonored in 1873? That the legislation demonetizing silver contributed to this congestion of business and the wretchedness we witnessed during those long years can not, in my judgment, be questioned. Silver was depreciated and dishonored, gold was laureled and crowned; and yet who during all that period saw a gold dollar or received one in business? A few may have bought them as souvenirs or as relics of better days, but not one of them was in circulation among the people as money or given in compensation for honest toil. The volume of the currency was contracted, prices were depreciated, labor was without employment or remuneration, and it looked much as if there was to be a return to the experiences of the Dark Ages.

It has been said that at the commencement of the Christian era "the money of the Roman Empire aggregated $1,800,000,000. By the end of the fifteenth century it had shrunk to less than $200,000,000." During this period of contraction and loss "a most extraordinary and baleful change took place in the condition of the world. Population dwindled, and commerce, arts, wealth, and freedom all disappeared. The people were reduced by poverty and misery to the most degraded conditions of serfdom and slavery. The disintegration of society was almost complete. The conditions of life were so hard that individual selfishness was the only thing consistent with the instinct of preservation. All public spirit, all generous emotions, all the noble aspirations of man shriveled and disappeared as the volume of money shrunk and as prices fell."

This is but an exaggerated picture of our own condition during the period of which I speak. Various explanations have been given of this breaking down of the framework of society, and of man's demoralization, but it was certainly coincident with the shrinkage of values, the loss of money and its contraction below the necessities and demands of labor and commerce. The demoralization, the crumbling of institutions, the wretchedness and selfishness of man kept even step and pace with the shrinkage in the stock of money and the depreciation of prices. And as with us, what a suggestive coincidence it is that the first glimmer of light, the first ray of sunshine to dispel the darkness of despair, only came with more money. Instead of coming with the remonetization of silver, as in our land, it came with the invention of bills of exchange and paper substitutes, through which the scanty stock of the precious metals was increased in efficiency and the demands of business supplied.

With a sufficiency of money manufactures will flourish and multiply, commerce will be stimulated and invite investments, capital will encourage the energies of the people to production, and production is wealth. The laborer will find employment, and will be worthy of his hire, and, what is more important to wife and little ones, will receive it. Individual and national prosperity will follow. Homes will be multiplied in number and the common happiness of man augmented. We all know the difference between periods of business activity and business depression, between growth and stagnation, between unhealthy congestion and honest, legitimate expansion. A scarcity of money means a lack of production, dull times, suspension of business, low wages or none at all, non-payment of debts, tramps, poverty, want, and general wretchedness. Which shall we have? This is the important inquiry of the hour.

People with fixed incomes may survive these periods of contraction and depression, but to the common laborer and the debtor it brings a train of evils, crushing in its momentum and irresistible in its power.

This brings us as legislators, as representatives desiring our country's good—the good of all, rich and poor, strong and weak, the laborer and the capitalist—to the practicable questions: What shall we gain by the destruction of the money faculty of silver? Can we sustain ourselves and promote our common good with gold and paper money based on gold only? The first question I will examine briefly a little later. To examine the second intelligently we must profit somewhat by the experiences of the ages gone, and must ascertain the amount of gold and silver in circulation as money or in existence in such a state as to be converted into money if business should require. The quantity has been variously estimated, and all calculations are at best largely conjectural.

But it is well settled that for nearly thirty years the production of gold has been steadily declining, instead of expanding, with the growth of numbers and with the exchanges of mankind, while its consumption in the arts has been so increased by the advancing wealth and population of the world that at this time it absorbs every dollar of the annual yield of the mines, leaving absolutely none for monetary purposes. In a very able and interesting speech recently delivered in the Senate, Senator TELLER introduced a table furnished him by the Director of the Mint, giving his estimate of the world's stock of gold and silver. This table I use, and it will be observed, as suggested by Senator TELLER, that in this table no estimate is made of the silver of China, Java, Persia, Siam, and other Asiatic countries, and as all these contain much silver it is evident the estimate is too low.

*Estimated by the Director of the Mint. †Wahrung's Politik, 1884. ‡Bank reserves only.

But whether this estimate is too high or too low, it is known to all that hitherto the two metals have not sufficed as a circulating medium, and all nations have been compelled to resort to paper or to other representatives of value to make up the lack of gold and silver. But if this paper or other representative of value is to be of permanent worth, it must have some fixed proportion to the amount of gold and silver held as the basis of its issue. As said by Senator TELLER in the speech from which I have quoted:

> We can not have forgotten in this country the large issue of the national notes during the war, without any considerable amount of gold and silver in reserve, either in the hands of the people or in the vaults of the Government. Its rapid depreciation was not from a want of faith in the Government ultimately paying these notes, but because it was apparent that the Government could not then pay in coin. In the nature of things, a paper currency not based on gold or silver will not circulate beyond the territorial limits of the nation issuing the same; but make it exchangeable on demand for coin, and its value will be substantially the same throughout the commercial world, the difference being only the cost of the exchange.

If then it has been found necessary to aid gold and silver in doing the world's business, what philosophy is there in the proposition that from this time forth gold alone will suffice? Are the wants of the people to be less? Is trade to be less active? Is labor to be idle? Are the sons of Aaron to want less? Is there to be no compensation for work? Is there to be no thrift, no growth, no development, no prosperity? Is all to be stagnation and deterioration? These are conditions not to be encouraged, conditions we do not want, conditions that the dictates of humanity should prompt us one and all to guard against, if possible, by wise and patriotic legislation. We need all the metal money we have, and all the paper money it will sustain, for the convenience of trade.

Fifty-eight million of people need more money than thirty million, and one hundred million will need more than fifty-eight, and as the days and years go by we find a constantly increasing demand in the busy and swelling activities of life. As our commerce is widened, our interests diversified, our progress promoted, our demand and necessity for money is augumented; and yet, knowing this and realizing it, as all must, bankers and capitalists confront us with the proposition that our mints must be closed to silver, that this metal that has served us so faithfully and honestly in all these years shall be discarded and dishonored, and that, with Great Britain and Germany, we will only accept gold as the standard of value and give it to our creditors as the only money worthy of the Government.

Professor Soetbeer, who is generally accepted as the best European authority on the statistics of gold and its consumption in the arts, estimates that the annual yield of the mines of the world was $134,000,000 during the decade ending with 1860. It fell to $125,000,000 per year for the decade ending with 1870, and to $113,000,000 per year during the decade ending with 1880, and for the year 1880 it was only $101,000,000. Since that year it has continued to decline, and for the year 1884 the same authority estimates the yield at $93,000,000, and being a supporter of the single gold standard he can not be suspected of a disposition to underrate the production of that metal.

In respect to the consumption of gold in the arts and for ornamentation Soetbeer estimates that in Europe, America, and Australia alone, exclusive of old jewelry and of other old materials reworked, the annual average was $13,300,000 during the decade ending with 1850, $18,600,000 with the decade ending 1860, $38,200,000 during the decade ending with 1870, and $55,600,000 per year for the decade ending with 1880, and for the last year it is estimated that the amount was $81,000,000. We all know how enormous the development of wealth has been within fifty years, and especially since the great impetus given to industry and commerce by the mining discoveries in California and Australia and the yield of silver in Nevada and Colorado. The use of gold for purposes of luxury, splendor, and the arts depends upon the wealth rather than upon the population of the world; and in modern times, with the constant increase of human control over the forces of nature, opulence is advancing in all civilized countries much more rapidly than population, and the figures show, as we would expect them to show under such circumstances, a corresponding increase in the use of gold in the arts.

During the thirty India fiscal years ending March, 1880, the net annual import of gold for that country averaged $16,000,000, and during the last five fiscal years ending March 31, 1881, it is estimated that the average annual importations was a little in excess of $20,000,000. Thus we see that the total yield of all the gold mines in the world is consumed in the arts and decorations of Europe, America, and Australia, with the imports to India, and not a single dollar is left to repair the waste and loss of coins or to supply the expanding necessities of the people and the enlarging commerce and exchanges of the world. With these facts patent to all, and confronting us like a revelation, the monometallists of the country ask us to strike down all else but gold and to exalt it as the only money with which the people shall be permitted to pay their debts.

In the days of their ignorance and superstition Aaron erected a golden calf for the children of Israel; but Moses in his superior wisdom and loyalty to God struck it down and with fire burned it and reduced it to powder. Let our modern Aarons beware how in their avarice and greed they exalt false gods and command obedience to them, or the men who work our mines and conduct our workshops, who build our railroads and cultivate our farms, who subdue our prairies and make of them the gardens of the world, may rise in their majesty and power and strike down the golden images and bury in the débris those who exalt and erect them. [Applause.]

We have in the United States, it is estimated, about $626,422,646 in coin and gold bullion. With this we are to maintain our credit, pay our debts, carry on the concerns of government, build up the industries of the nation, give employment to men, and do all that a government can do for the happiness and prosperity of the people. Let us for a few moments look at this as a practical proposition, and let us contemplate what we owe as a people and as a nation. The national debt on the 1st day of this month was $1,845,923,686.47. The State, county, and municipal debt (estimated) is $1,125,585,546. The railroad and corporation debt (estimated) is $5,750,914,158, and the individual debt is estimated at $9,000,000,000, making a grand total of $17,722,423,380.47 as our indebtedness. Estimating our population at 58,000,000, this makes a per capita debt of $305.55 for every man, woman, and child claiming the benefits and protection of our Government.

Dividing the gold we have among our fifty-eight million of people gives to each $10.81. With these $10.81 the demand of the monometallist is that our people shall pay a per capita indebtedness as it becomes due of $305.55. Does it need a prophet to tell us the result of such legislation? Shall we make the experiment that we may know from actual experience the wretchedness, the beggary, the want that can be inflicted upon the country by taking from silver and every representative of money except gold its legal-tender functions? Shall we so legislate that we may know how labor and all productions of labor will depreciate and fall in value while gold and the interest collected by the money-loaner will appreciate and advance? Milton put into the mouth of Satan this language, "Which way I fly is hell;" and yet, in my judgment, his troubles were not comparable to those of the debtor class of this country should we give heed to the importunities of those wanting such legislation.

In our boyhood days we read the story of Atahualpa, the captured Inca of Peru, and we remember how our hearts went out to him in sympathy, and our breasts choked with indignation as we contemplated the conditions of his ransom. Long and loud were the anathemas we expressed against his captors as we condemned them to proper punishment for their cruelty and their wrong. As the condition of his discharge from captivity he was compelled to fill a room 22 feet long, 17 feet wide, and 9 feet high with gold. But in this more modern day the proposition is made to us that to secure our ransom from the captivity of debt we shall, for the gratification of our creditors, fill eleven hundred and forty-five rooms 22 feet long, 17 feet wide, and 9 feet high with glittering gold, and we see the President of the United States standing by, clapping his hands and contemplating the task with pleasurable emotion and asking Congress to see that the burden is imposed upon us without unnecessary delay. To him the sufferings of the poor and the direful consequences to the debtor class are of no importance. The creditor must have his gold though bankruptcy and ruin prostrate every industry and leave desolate every hearthstone.

Mr. Chairman, in considering the dangers that are said to be impending and the phantoms that are presented to our vision by the advocates of the single standard unless Congress shall promptly arrest silver coinage, we naturally inquire: "What has been our actual experience in the past, and particularly under the silver act of 1878?" Have we had gold and paper money redeemable in gold in sufficient volume to do our business, accommodate our commerce, answer to the demands of trade, and give thrift and prosperity to the people? Has there been a time in the history of our Government when gold could do this? Is it reasonable to suppose there will come a time in the history of our Republic when gold can do this? In fact, does history tell us of a government since the morning stars sang together where gold existed in such quantities that it furnished a sufficient circulating medium for the people and answered to the demands and necessities of the government?

Did the coinage act of 1878 drive gold from our country and precipitate upon us the crisis depicted by the alarmists? Did it convert America into a "dumping-ground" for cheap silver from all Europe, and bring dishonor upon the Government and repudiation to the people? These questions must be answered in the negative. At the beginning of 1878 we had been virtually without metallic money for seventeen years. In the popular sense, at that time it was not money. The people were strangers to it. It was in the vaults of the Treasury or owned by banks and kept from the circulating medium of the country. During the preceding seven years we had produced about $300,000,000 of gold and almost as much silver, and yet thousands of men actively engaged in business had never handled a dollar of either except it was in subsidiary silver coin. From the demonetization of silver in 1873 until the coinage act of 1878 became a law, the exports of gold exceeded the imports $123,754,210, or an average of $20,625,000 per year.

With the remonetization of silver came prosperity; confidence was restored, labor was encouraged, business was revived, and the pulse of the nation was again buoyant and healthy. Trade turned in our favor, and instead of gold leaving us, driven out by the despised silver dollar, it came to us by millions and passed into the hands of the common people, and for the first time in twenty years performed the functions of a circulating medium. Since the act of 1878 the gold coming to our shores has exceeded the exports $200,856,031, and we have been adding to our stock more than $60,000,000 each year, and during the same period the foreign demand for silver has been such that the exports have exceeded our imports. But let us examine a little further the condition of the country and see if the predictions of the bondholders and bankers of 1878 have been verified in a single particular. In that year we had in gold coin in the United States $218,000,000, and in bullion in the mints and assay offices $10,671,164, making a total of gold coin and bullion, $228,671,164.

Now, we have in gold coin and bullion (estimated) $626,733,869. In 1877 the deposits in the national banks were $630,400,000. In 1885 they were $1,120,100,000. In 1877 the capital stock of the national banks was $479,500,000. In 1885 it was $527,500,000. In 1877 there was in specie in the national banks $22,700,000. In 1885 it had grown to $174,900,000, and during this time it is estimated that the accumulations of the people in the savings-banks had increased $300,000,000.

In addition to this we had reduced the bonded indebtedness of the Government about $600,000,000, had advanced its credit, had resumed specie payment, had lowered the rate of interest, and was almost the only government in the world that had more gold in 1885 than in 1877. Is this not a good showing for the despised "buzzard dollar?"

What is there in this history that proves the legislation of 1878 unwise, dishonest, or disastrous? With the assistance of silver we have made this progress and increased our stock of gold $397,751,482. Only one nation in the world has more gold than the United States, and this nation (France) has three times and one-half as much silver per capita as we. And while we have been making, with the assistance of silver, this wonderful accumulation of gold, England, Ireland, Scotland, and Germany, where silver is dishonored, and where gold is the only standard, have witnessed its departure from their shores and have seen the bank deposits grow less day by day and the condition of the people more precarious and the condition of the government more unfortunate. [Applause.] This is the answer experience has furnished to those who would dishonor silver and send it a fugitive from the land where it is produced in greater quantities than in any other government of the entire circuit of the sun.

True it is that the bullion value of the silver dollar is not a hundred cents in gold; but does it necessarily follow from this that it is a "dishonest dollar," "a clipped dollar," or an "80-cent dollar?" Compare it with the standard of produce, of merchandise, of labor (the real representative of value), and we find no depreciation in the intrinsic worth of the 371¼ grains of honest silver represented by the silver dollar. These tables have been given and comparisons made by others in the course of this debate and I will not repeat them, but repeat the inquiry, Has not gold been appreciated and put beyond its real value by this proposed legislation and by the action of European governments? But if silver has been depreciated, who is responsible for it?

In 1873 when the coinage was suspended in this country, and when Germany and the Scandinavian states were demonetizing it, it was worth more than gold and commanded a premium. Then, in the judgment of these monometallists, it was worth too much. But now, having wrought its ruin, as they contend, they ask that it shall be spurned by all, and some of them pretend to say they do this in the interest of silver; some of them with a smile that is "childlike and bland" suggest, "Let us suspend its coinage until its value has appreciated and until an international convention can be held by all the great commercial governments of the world and its coinage provided for." What an innocent and unsophisticated suggestion, and yet how insincere or ill-advised. They know, as is known by every bimetallist in the land, that it is this organized fight against the silver dollar that has worked its depreciation as compared with gold. They know, as is known by every bimetallist, that France, with a population only two-thirds as great as ours and with barely one-eighteenth of the territory, sustains a full legal-tender silver circulation of $535,000,000 (more than double our own) and sustains it at an exact parity with gold, and has during these recent years of divergence, and without any loss in the volume of its gold money, although the silver dollar of France in bullion is worth 3 per cent. less than our own. And they know, as every man, woman, and child should know, that if the coinage of silver was made free, and this administration would make an honest effort to promote its usefulness and value, the silver dollar would be worth a hundred cents in gold coin in less than twelve months. [Applause.]

But instead of this, the persistent cry of this administration has been that no one wanted silver; that it was rapidly filling the vaults of the Treasury to overflowing and could not be gotten into circulation; that it was token-money and no longer passed current in commercial centers, and so eager was the new President to join in the crusade against silver that he was not content to wait until his inauguration and until he was inducted into office and had the constitutional right of submitting to Congress his recommendations, but had the indecent haste of sending to the Forty-eighth Congress an ante-nuptial message [laughter] urging immediate legislation against the people's money. Let it be said, however, to the credit of the Democratic members of this House, that they could not be frightened by a novice in statesmanship and stood faithful by the people's money. The fear of disfavor with the appointing power did not deter them and the recommendations from the Hudson passed as the imaginary conjurings of the brokers and bankers of Wall street.

If there are any who doubt the effect of the policy of this administration upon silver, let me quote from a few English authorities. At the beginning of 1885 the London price of silver per ounce was 50*d.*, but it fell to the panic price of 47½*d.* on the 17th day of September, upon the publication in the London Times of that day of the following dispatch from Philadelphia, under the date of September 16:

A Cabinet council was held yesterday to consider the silver question. Both the President and Secretary of the Treasury will recommend Congress to stop the coinage of silver dollars.

The London Economist of September 12, commenting upon the fall in silver, said:

In the main, it is only the old cause—apprehension as to the future of silver—which has been in operation for years, but which has been recently revived and intensified by the agitation in the United States against the continuous coinage of silver.

The London and China Telegraph of the 29th of September says:

At a Cabinet council held in Washington on the 15th instant it was resolved to recommend Congress to stop coining silver under the Bland bill, and the semi-panic on Thursday, September 17, was a not unnatural consequence.

The London Bankers' Magazine for the beginning of October says:

The agitation of the repeal of the Bland act is a main cause of the depreciation. The amount of silver coinage in the States is £5,000,000 annually; and were Congress to sanction an abrogation of the law that enforces the absorption of that amount by the Treasury a complete glut would doubtless be seen on the market.

The Manchester Guardian of October 16 says:

The recent heavy fall in the silver market and the Eastern exchanges has been caused mainly by an apprehension of the repeal of the American silver coinage act of 1878.

But it is said that silver should be demonetized that we may have a certain inflexible standard of value. When did gold become such? When, where, under what circumstances, and in what government has it stood by the people, resisting panics and protecting them from the calamitous consequences of a fluctuating and uncertain circulating medium at times of danger or of national distress? We all know how it scampered from business and took refuge in old stockings and behind iron bars when treason organized its battalions and marshaled its armies for the overthrow of our Republic. And it is a fact that I commend to the thoughtful consideration of the advocates of the single standard upon the floor of this House that in England in twenty-seven years, beginning with 1847, the Bank of England changed its rate of interest two hundred and twenty-three times, and the range of fluctuations was from 2½ to 10 per cent. It is now about 2 per cent. While in one hundred and twenty-two years preceding 1816, when the single gold standard was adopted, there were only sixteen changes, and the rate never fell below 4 per cent. and never rose above 6 per cent.

For more than fifty years England with her single metal standard has been conspicuous for the frequency and violence of her commercial and monetary panics. In fact I charge and I challenge history to confirm the statement that gold unsupported by silver is as unstable as fiat money. The long experience of England has shown it to be one of the most fluctuating and treacherous of currencies, and, with free trade, has pauperized the farmers and laborers of Great Britain until only yesterday thousands and tens of thousands of them were marching the streets of London and Nottingham threatening the government and asking for bread that they might live. The head of the British ministry a few years ago said, "England did not become rich by adopting gold, but adopted gold because it was already rich." It had accumulated its great wealth under a sounder and better system, which has enabled it thus far to endure the mischiefs of a single standard, which, as has been said, "has made it the peculiar seat of monetary crises, just as Egypt is of the plague and India of the cholera." History does not tell us of a government that ever had too much gold and silver for its own good and for the prosperity of its subjects, and in the ages gone we find no trace of any commercial people that have been able to grow and thrive upon gold alone as its circulating medium.

Mr. Chairman, can we hope to reverse the experience of the centuries? Have we learned the secret of the famed genii and secured the magic wand with the touch of which we can convert the baser metals into gold? Unless so we should heed the lessons emphasized by the experiences of all nations and all tongues from the day of Adam to the present. If we would avert the danger and heresies of fiat paper money; if we would restore confidence and revive our drooping industries; if we would encourage commerce and open up new avenues; if we would overcome the present congestion and send the hot blood of business activity into every hamlet in the land; if we would put the spindles in motion and give employment to labor; if we would legislate for the good of all and for the happiness and prosperity of every hamlet, let us be done with this effort to appreciate the price of gold and to add additional burdens to the debtors of our land. [Applause.]

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman from Kansas argues about getting rid of the dangers of fiat money if we do so and so. Now, does the gentleman know of any paper fiat money which ever existed in the world?

Mr. PERKINS. If you will observe my line of argument it is this: there is not sufficient gold in the country to do its business, and unless we have silver to sustain gold we must necessarily come to fiat paper money.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman from Kansas mistakes my question. Many have been under the impression that what are known as the "greenback" and national-bank notes are fiat money. The gentleman, however, seems to use the words "fiat paper money" as though he had experience in this or some other country of the use of such fiat paper money. My point is that there never has been any such fiat paper money in the world. I ask the gentleman to show me where there has been, and if he can not do so it is evidently unfair to make such reference to fit paper money.

Mr. PERKINS. My proposition is that unless we have gold sustained by silver we must necessarily come to fiat paper, and in order to avoid the embarrassment and difficulties of resorting to fiat paper money I want to stand by the honest silver dollar.

Mr. BRUMM. Does the gentleman mean to say we have any difficulty or embarrassment resulting from fiat paper money, or is it only an impression he has?

Mr. PERKINS. During the war we had so-called fiat paper money which resulted in embarrassment and difficulty to the people and the Government.

Mr. BRUMM. Does the gentleman mean to say that during the war there was anything like fiat paper money in this country?

Mr. PERKINS. No, not exactly, for although it was called fiat paper money it was not absolutely so, because it was to be redeemable in coin some time or other.

Mr. BRUMM. There never was any fiat money in this country nor in any other. I ask the gentleman to mention any such case if he knows of any.

Mr. PERKINS. I can not stop in the course of my speech to answer the gentleman's question, and I will content myself merely by referring to George Law's money and to the assignats of France and other instances.

Let us stand by those metals which in consequence of their divisibility, portability, durability, and indestructibility have demonstrated their intrinsic worth and their real value as money or as mediums of barter and exchange. Rust and mold can not corrode them, and chemical action is not likely to work their disintegration. Mr. Chairman, let us make the coinage of these royal metals free and unlimited, and let us provide for silver and gold certificates of $1 and upward on all deposits in the Treasury or subtreasuries of gold or silver bullion or coin of standard fineness when $10 or more shall be presented. Let us inform the world that we can not be used by Great Britain as an assisting party in driving silver from monetary use in the commercial world, and let us inform the world that without such assistance it can not be done.

Let us say in deeds that are not capable of misconstruction that we fully realize the disasters that would follow the world's dethronement of silver. Let us say, as President Francis A. Walker, an able advocate of the suspension of silver coinage, has recently been compelled to admit, "that among its consequences will be the enhancement of the burden of all debts and fixed charges, acting as a steady drag upon production, and that suffocation and strangulation are words hardly too strong to express the agony of the industrial body when embraced in the coils of a contracting currency."

If the business of the world is to be based on metallic money, as I think it should be, the production of either metal would be entirely insufficient. But gold and silver must both be used as money to supply the necessities of trade, commerce, and humanity, and to give stability to each, and the production of both must continuously increase if the world is to grow in wealth, comfort, and human happiness. Denounced as the silver dollar is, England and Germany use it for the payment of their wage-workers, but want only gold for their creditors.

In this Government of the people and for the people let us demand justice for all; and as we are engaged in this discussion the tidings come from Germany and Great Britain that light is dawning, that the clouds are breaking, that the mists are disappearing, that the people are thinking, bankers are talking, chambers of commerce resolving, and even the "Iron Chancellor" of Germany discussing whether the oppressive and ruinous single standard shall not give way to the more liberal, the more stable, the more progressive double standard of the United States of America. [Applause.] Gold will no longer be crowned as the only royal money, but with it will modestly sit silver listening to the importunities of the people, helping the unfortunate, and contributing relief to the exigencies and necessities of trade and commerce.

Mr. Chairman, we do not come with the hands of communism to tear down or to destroy, we do not come in lawless organizations to demand that which is wrong or to defeat that which is right, we do not come asking that the accumulations of other years shall be taken from its possessors and distributed to the unfortunate. But we do come with hands bronzed in the bright sunshine of our Western prairies, and hardened in the mines of our Western mountains, asking that in this imperial Chamber of the nation's greatness there shall be some recognition of labor. [Applause.] We come asking that in this representative body the poor as well as the rich, the weak as well as the strong, the debtor as well as the creditor shall be remembered and legislated for. We come asking that the pioneer, who with ox-team and plow is marking the way for future empires, or breaking the prairies to feed the hungry, shall not be forgotten. Capital is strong, capital is vigilant, capital is organized, capital is capable of taking care of itself, and if neglected by the Government will find means of its own for investment and profit. As said by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. FINDLAY], "The money-owners have cities of refuge in all the capitals of Europe, in which they find ready access by the purchase of foreign exchange." But not so with the wage-worker, the toiler, the debtor, and the unfortunate. These need the fostering care of a sympathetic Government and the encouragement and protection of wise and helpful legislation, and let us show an appreciation of their necessities as well as a disposition to do justice to all. As said by a distinguished Senator in the course of debate in the Senate Chamber, "I have no sympathy with any ambition which seeks for any object to array labor against capital. As labor is before capital and created capital, labor should be first considered, not forgetting, however, that capital is the handmaid of labor and, if wisely employed, its truest and best friend. The legislation, therefore, which serves labor most serves capital best." Let us do what we can to contribute to the thrift and prosperity of all, the employer and employed—the farmer and manufacturer, the debtor and creditor—and believing the precious metals of our Western mountains is one of the most important agencies to accomplish this I would stand loyally by each and would not demonetize or dishonor either. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to look briefly at the general policy of the present administration. I wish to turn the "Pan-Electric" light [laughter] upon its professions and practices and ascertain what there is of good for the general public. It has professed a respect for the civil-service statute, and yet has broken its provisions and violated its requirements with impunity when inclination prompted it so to do. It has professed a desire for an honest and efficient public service, but has appointed convicted felons and incompetent men to positions of trust and responsibility.

It has professed a willingness to correct mistakes, and yet has sent to the Senate for confirmation the names of men known to be morally unfit and a reproach to the communities from whence they come; and if you wish the names of some of these there are Democratic members upon the floor of this House that can give them.

It has professed a disposition to send men abroad who could represent us with credit and with advantage to our country, and yet there are vacant places in our diplomatic service to-day because odious and objectionable representatives were not received; and it is said that men have been designated to speak for this great nation of 58,000,000 people in the courts of Europe who until the time of their appointment had never been in a Northern State in their lives, and who had no conception of the interests and greatness of their country, and who for more than twenty years had not taken enough interest in its wonderful growth and development to have their political disabilities removed.

It has professed a wish to observe and enforce the law, and yet we see it violating statutes, ignoring legislation, and organizing to enforce a policy of its own.

It has professed a desire to promote and advance the interest of the laboring masses, and yet we find it authorizing the employment of convict labor on our public works and organizing to break down some of our largest and most successful industrial institutions.

It professes to favor American commerce, and yet refuses to carry out laws enacted by Congress to encourage and strengthen American shipping, and by its unjust and unlawful discriminations has taken the business of carrying the American mails from the most important line of American vessels.

It professes love for the American Navy, but demands from American ship-builders tests never heard of in naval warfare, and refuses to accept the Dolphin until she can encounter blizzards and ride the sea in storms so violent and tempestuous that naval reformers can not retain their places and witness her movements.

It professes economy and retrenchment, but wants $50,000,000 per year more than its immediate predecessor to conduct and carry on the concerns of government. [Laughter.]

It professes to desire the good of all classes and all sections, and yet, commencing with the western boundary of the State of New York and continuing thence west to the Pacific Ocean, a distance of 3,200 miles, who in all that vast empire of wealth and intelligence is selected to speak for the people and look after their interests in the Cabinet of this so-called reform administration? We find the national banks, the standard oil companies, and the telephone companies represented [laughter]; the aristocratic families and cod-fisheries of New England remembered [laughter], and the State of Delaware and the solid South provided for; but who speaks for Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Iowa, Nebraska, Kansas, Colorado, Nevada, Oregon, and California, and the great Territories of Dakota, Wyoming, Idaho, Utah, New Mexico, Arizona, and Washington?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Wall street speaks for them.

Mr. PERKINS. Here live more than twenty-one million five hundred thousand people, intelligent, patriotic, industrious, and devoted to their country—the ex-soldiers of the Union, the farmers of the great prairies, the workers in the mines, the representatives of great cities, the toilers in every avocation and business known to our land—and their only Cabinet representation in this administration is in the person of a pleasant gentleman from Wisconsin, who never had a day's experience in governmental matters in his life until honored by his preferment, and who had only reached a fair measure of fame in the local courts of his State as a practicing attorney. We find it contracting the currency, making no effort to reduce the bonded debt of the nation until forced to do so by public opinion, and bringing silver at great expense to the Government from distant mints to Washington that Congress might be frightened at the extraordinary display.

It professes a desire to lessen the burdens of the people and to contribute to the growth and development of all sections, but it has no word for internal improvement and no encouragement for the great water ways of the country and the cheap transportation of the people.

It professes a wish for the good of American industry and the prosperity of American labor, but in its coils enterprises are stranded, workmen discharged, labor suspended, and doubt and disparagement expressed for the capacity of the engineers of the American Navy, while the accomplishments of the John Bulls who are the constructing engineers of her majesty's service are exalted and magnified. "It's English, you know." [Laughter.]

It professed justice, sincerity, and love of fair play, but organized star-chamber methods and secret inquisitions that the names of honorable men might be blackened in the dark and their official reputations compromised and ruined by nameless defamers and paid falsifiers, until the Washington Post, the national Democratic organ, was compelled in decency and for the good of its own organization to make this indignant protest against such dishonorable practices:

> Things were managed thus by the council often when the life and honor of the noblest in the land were at the mercy of every anonymous assassin. Such methods flourished in the days of Torquemada; even later, when malice, tyranny, hatred, savagery nursed into evil life the lettre de cachet. But civilization has long ago condemned them, and every fiber of a freeman's heart protests against their restoration. The transfer of the Government to the Democracy can be effected without resorting to methods so unwholesome and abhorrent. This practice of incriminating, prosecuting, and condemning Republican office-holders, trying them without a hearing, and casting them out branded with a nameless crime is the most repulsive thing to which our politics has ever given birth.
> [Applause.]
> If persisted in it will disgust and alienate every manly soul, and it will bury its authors and contrivers fathoms deep in odium.

It has professed a desire for honest elections and for the purity of the ballot-box, but it has pardoned the Mullins of Cincinnati and appointed the Pillsburys of Maine and the Meads of Mississippi to places of responsibility and power, and, as Senator HOAR is reported as saying, "If President Cleveland were to write over the gate of the White House, 'Frauds upon the elections will be profitably rewarded here,' he could not make the declaration more significant than he has made it by the 'character of his appointments.'"

It professes patriotism, but lowers the flag of the Union at the death of Jacob Thompson, and in its messages to Congress has no mention to make of that distinguished statesman, that invincible soldier, that incomparable citizen, the commander of our armies, the President of our nation, the loved of all—General Ulysses S. Grant.

This, in brief, Mr. Chairman, is the national Democratic reform administration of the nineteenth century, and as we listen to its professions and look upon its practices, is it any wonder that the mass of the American people are now of the opinion that when God in His inscrutable Providence permitted this organization to secure control of the destinies of this nation He made a great mistake? [Great laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. THOMAS, of Illinois. The gentleman from Kansas has not yet concluded his remarks, and I move that by unanimous consent he be allowed further time.

The CHAIRMAN. How long does the gentleman desire?

Mr. PERKINS. About fifteen minutes.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. PERKINS again took the floor and concluded the speech as above.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, the suspension of the coinage of silver is certainly one of the most important questions that will come before us during the sessions of the present Congress.

A large number of the members of this House are believers in a double standard. Between them and us there is an honest difference of opinion in relation to this question; therefore no man has the right to arrogate to himself that he is right and everybody who does not agree with him is wrong. No human intellect can claim infallibility. Let us then examine the question in a calm, considerate, and rational manner, with due respect for the opinions of those with whom we may differ.

The large amount of standard dollars in the United States Treasury coined out of the silver purchased under the provisions of the act of 1878 and for which the Government has no use should not fail to draw the attention of Congress to the fact that there is something wrong in the policy inaugurated under that law, especially as the standard dollar of 100 cents can only command 79 to 80 cents in gold in the markets of the world.

It has long been a pleasant dream with many political economists that gold and silver could be used as a metallic currency at a certain fixed ratio between them and under a system of unlimited coinage. This pleasing delusion is agitating the minds of political economists and legislators in our own and foreign countries at the present day.

With this view all civilized countries have fixed a ratio between gold and silver money, which they hoped would be permanent, from 1 to 14 and up to 1 to 16; but the ratio in every country has been a sliding scale which would never remain permanent except for a very few years or months at a time.

In our own country in the last hundred years it has varied about 37 per cent., the rate in 1781 being as 1 to 13.33 and in 1876 as 1 to 17.87, in 1883 being 1 to 18.40, the average for the year 1884 being about 1 to 20; showing a heavy fall in the value of silver as measured by gold.

In England you are aware that gold is the principal metallic currency; Germany has demonetized silver and adopted gold, whilst the Latin Union, composed of France, Belgium, Italy, and Switzerland, has adopted gold as their principal metallic currency with a limited coinage of silver at a pro rata according to their respective populations. But at the present time no nation, except India, Mexico, and the United States, is coining silver. Russia has a silver currency, and India and the East generally have the same. The poorest nations always have the cheapest metal for currency, as being best adapted to their small dealings in their internal commerce, as shown in the small coins of India and China.

In order to refresh the memory it will not be amiss to briefly review the efforts that were made to establish the double standard by international conferences. During the universal exposition or "world's fair" held in Paris, 1867, there was a "monetary conference" composed of about twenty European nations and the United States, the object of which was, as stated by the French minister of foreign affairs at the opening of the convention, "to substitute, instead of the variety of monetary types actually in use, metallic coins struck in accordance with uniform regulations and placed beyond any variations of exchange, which would in effect be to remove one of the most serious obstacles to the development of international relations."

In other words, it was to ascertain whether the nations could agree on unification of coinage by adopting a universal unit, such as the franc, the dollar, or the pound sterling; whether the gold or single standard or the double standard should be adopted; and whether or not a fixed ratio between the two metals could be maintained.

The conference wrestled manfully with these and other questions pertinent to the subject through eight sessions, extending from June 17 to July 6, 1867.

They came at last to the conclusion to report to their respective governments the result of their deliberations to be a recommendation of a single standard of gold; coins of equal weights; coins of equal fineness, coins divided according to the decimal system and a gold piece of five francs as a unit. Mr. Parien proposed this paragraph, namely: "The conference expresses the hope that the measures taken by the governments of the different States to modify their monetary system, in conformity with the basis laid down by the conference, may end in diplomatic conventions," which paragraph was unanimously adopted. Mr. Samuel B. Ruggles was our representative in the conference. The hope expressed above was not acted on until a decade later.

About 1876 the increasing production of silver instigated the owners of the mines to look around for a market for it. In 1874 there was coined by our mints $5,983,600; in 1875 the coinage was $10,070,368; and in 1876 it was $19,126,502; in 1883 it was $28,835,470, showing a rapid increase of that metallic coin.

By a joint resolution of Congress passed August 15, 1876, a commission of distinguished Senators, Representatives, and citizens was appointed to inquire, among other things, "into the change which has taken place in the relative value of gold and silver; the causes thereof, whether permanent or otherwise; the effects thereof upon trade, commerce, finance, and the productive interests of the country, and upon the standard of value in this and foreign countries;" and also into the policy of the restoration of the double standard in this country, and, if restored, what the legal relations between the two coins, gold and silver, should be.

This commission sat for a long time in New York and Washington. They examined men eminent as statesmen, political economists, theorists, writers on currency, bankers, brokers, and business men of every kind who were supposed to have any knowledge of the movements and operations of the precious metals and the causes moving thereto.

The majority of the commission came to the conclusion, as stated in their report, that "the causes of the recent change in the relative value of gold and silver are mainly the demonetization of silver by Germany, the United States, and the Scandinavian states, and the closure of all the mints in Europe against its coinage.

These principal causes were aided by a contemporaneous diminution of the Asiatic demand for silver and by enormous exaggerations of the actual and prospective yield of the Nevada silver mines. The effect of all the causes, principal and accessory, reached its culminating point in the panic of July, 1876, in the London silver market. Many of these causes were essentially temporary. The Asiatic demand for silver has somewhat recovered its accustomed force, and the delusions in respect to the Nevada mines no longer exist.

What "delusions" there may have been concering the Nevada mines I know not, but the last report of the Director of the Mint shows a regular annual coinage of over twenty-eight millions of the standard silver dollars, and the report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows that more than seventy-six millions of them remain unused in the Treasury.

The report further states:

> The commission have been able to arrive at only the one single conclusion, that resumption in this country is not practicable under the circumstances until the existing laws making gold the sole metallic legal tender are repealed.

And yet, if I remember right, specie payments were successfully resumed within two and a half years of the sitting of the commission and before nine millions of the standard silver dollars were coined. The commission therefore recommended the restoration of the double standard and the unrestricted coinage of both metals, but were unable to agree upon the legal relation that should be established between them, which rendered their recommendations of little value.

The minority of the commission, however, came to a different conclusion. They showed with great clearness the great tendency of silver to large fluctuations in the markets of the world, and that it was unreliable as a standard of value. In this regard they are sustained by the fact that when the report was written silver was worth 53*d.* per ounce, while now it is worth only about 47*d.* per ounce. Among the conclusions at which they arrived was this, that—

> The so-called double standard is an illusion and an impossibility. The prolonged attempts made both by France and the United States to establish such a standard have been complete failures, causing much confusion and inconvenience, necessitating frequent changes of legislation, and resulting only in the alternate establishment of one or the other precious metal as the sole standard.

The suggestions of the majority of the commission for the more extended coinage of silver were carried out in the law of February 28, 1878, which provided for the coinage of the silver dollar of 412.5 grains which had been discontinued by the act of 1873.

The act of 1878 also provided that the President should invite the governments of the Latin Union, and such others as he might deem advisable, "to join the United States in a conference to adopt a common ratio between gold and silver for the purpose of establishing internationally the use of bimetallic money and securing a fixity of relative value between these metals."

Pursuant to the invitation extended to them by the United States, twelve European governments met at Paris on the 10th of August, 1878, and continued through seven sessions until the 29th of that month, our country being represented by Reuben E. Fenton, W. S. Groesbeck (who had been one of the silver commission in 1876), Francis A. Walker, and S. Dana Horton, all eminent political economists.

Our representatives submitted two propositions to the conference, the first recommending the unrestricted coinage of silver and its use as money of unlimited legal tender, and the second that the use of both gold and silver as unlimited legal tender might safely be adopted by equalizing them at a relation to be fixed by international agreement. The convention listened to the arguments of our representatives with great attention and gave them full consideration. At their closing session, however, the conference adopted a memorandum, in reply to the American propositions which amounted in Pickwickian style to this: That both gold and silver should be used as money, but that the selection of one or the other or both at a time should be governed by the special position of states; that is, the restriction of the coinage of silver should be left to the states individually, and that under the circumstances in which states found themselves there could be no discussion of the adoption of a common ratio between the two metals.

The conference wound up its session by resolving itself into a mutual admiration society, and after scattering compliments toward each other generally, and to the United States in particular for having called them together for an interchange of views on such an important subject, they adjourned without having arrived at any practical conclusions. Our representatives were thus politely bowed out with permission to return home as wise as they went.

Thus ended fruitlessly the second international conference in which our Government has endeavored to procure the adoption of a universal standard. Undismayed by its own past experience and failures to maintain a double standard and unconvinced of its impossibility by the rebuffs that it received in two international conferences, our Government still endeavors to achieve the impossible. Although the coinage of gold and silver from 1792 to 1834 was unrestricted, yet silver being overvalued formed the bulk of our metallic currency, and gold being undervalued here was exported where its true value was better appreciated.

In 1834 Congress overvalued gold, and the result was that it became the predominant coin. Silver being undervalued commanded a premium and was sent abroad, its value as bullion being about 3 per cent. more than its value as coin. Thus gold continued practically the standard from 1834 till 1862, when we went into an irredeemable paper currency. In 1873 silver was demonetized, not being a legal tender over $5. The act of 1878, however, gave it new life and afforded a market for the silver miners in the Western States and Territories, at the expense of the people of the nation who are now compelled to take at par a silver coin which is 21 per cent. under par.

This experience of our own country and the futile efforts of international conferences to agree upon a double standard, and the demonetization of silver by England, Germany, the Latin Union, and the Scandinavian states ought to convince legislators that it is impossible to maintain a double standard; the fluctuations in the price of silver forbid it. In our country the relative value of silver to gold was never the same for more than three consecutive years, and in England the divergence was larger than our own. To preserve a fixed ratio between the two metals for any length of time would thus seem to be an impossibility.

To attempt to maintain a double standard is as absurd—

Said Mr. Bowen, of the silver commission—as it would be to declare by law that two clocks should both be the standard for measuring time, though, as everybody knows, no two clocks can be made which shall keep perfect time with each other.

It is as absurd as it would be to enact a law that any two commodities the result of human labor should bear a fixed relative value the one to the other.

Gold and silver receive their value from different causes, such as the expense of getting them from the mines, the amount needed for the uses of nations, and the hostile or favorable legislation of governments; each one of these causes has a bearing upon the price or value of them in the markets of the world. Hence it is that fixed ratios between the products of labor can never be long maintained.

In the early history of our State in a county adjoining my district the authorities were compelled to raise funds by taxation for the support of the county. As money was not plenty the authorities agreed to take country produce at prevailing rates, so on October 6, 1685, the tax collector was ordered to receive good and merchantable Indian corn at the rate of 2s. 8d., good and merchantable wheat at 4s. 6d., and good and merchantable rye at 3s. 6d. per bushel. This was on the same principle as establishing a fixed rate between silver and gold. The ratio between the grains did not remain stable very long, for at December term of the same year the court raised the price of wheat to 5s., rye to 5s., and 3s. for Indian corn.

The arbitrary power of legislation may make the gold and silver dollar equivalents in payment of debts among ourselves for a time, but whenever the balance of trade shall turn against our country the disparity in value between the two coins will be made apparent. If such a state of affairs existed to-day, gold would be rapidly exported and we would be remitted to a silver currency; the importing merchant who had been obliged to take silver dollars in payment for his merchandise would find that $1,000 of such coins would only be worth about $800 in the markets of England or France. If he should have to undergo so great a shave in purchasing his goods abroad, he would endeavor to make it up by sufficient additional charges on his wares to reimburse him in his loss, and the loss on the value of his money would be eventually imposed on the consumer of the merchandise that he should sell.

Aside from the violation of the well known laws regulating metallic currency that we are at present perpetrating there is a moral aspect of the question that deserves consideration. We are purchasing silver at a price that makes the coined dollar worth only about 80 cents, and we are imposing those dollars on the people at the rate of 100 cents. So successfully has been this imposition on the public that it appears from the information furnished us by the Director of the Mint that the Government has made a profit of $25,338,389.97 on the coinage of silver in the seven years ending June 30, 1885; and every man who has a silver dollar in his pocket has indirectly paid 20 cents into the Treasury without receiving an equivalent.

The great mass of this profit has arisen from the coinage of $218,259,761 coined up to December 31, 1885. That the silver coinage is excessive and not needed for the wants of the people is shown by the fact that seventy-six millions of silver dollars and $28,000,000 of fractional silver coins remained unused in the Treasury when that report was written. What nation but our own would perpetrate such a wrong on its citizens? Does it not stand alone as the great robber of the people? It assumes to itself that prerogative in a time of peace and in the midst of plenty. If a private individual should coin and circulate a silver dollar of the exact weight and fineness of the standard dollar, he would be guilty of a misdemeanor, and be obliged to suffer punishment, while the Government assumes the right to impose on the people depreciated coins to a profit of $25,000,000, benefiting none save the silver miners.

To them it has afforded a good market for their surplus silver, which is being piled up by the ton and useless in the Treasury. Why should this be so? Why should not the money used to buy silver bullion for coinage be used instead to pay on our interest-bearing debt, and thus relieve us of interest thereon? A much smaller outrage on a nation than this forcing on our people a depreciated coin created a great ferment in Ireland and led to the overthrow of a scheme of petty robbery of the Irish people.

In 1724 George I, of England, granted a patent to William Wood to supply the people of Ireland with copper half-pence and farthings. His patent authorized the issue of £108,000. Wood began to send his coins over to Ireland and to supply them with small change. Swift, in his Draper letters, resisted the issue, alleging that they were short weight and worthless metal. Carteret, the viceroy, endeavored to force their circulation. The whole country was in a ferment; the grand jury of the city of Dublin denounced them as a nuisance, and so strong was the hatred of the people to the debased coin that when about £40,000 was put in circulation the home Government was obliged to buy back its patent by giving Wood a pension.

And yet the people of the freest government on earth patiently and quietly submit to the imposition upon them at par of coins worth only 79 cents on the dollar.

Having shown that our efforts thus far to establish a common ratio between gold and silver by international agreement have been failures, the question presents itself, can we single-handed and alone maintain a double standard, and at the same time continue to coin not less than two millions of silver dollars per month? We have shown that the conclusion arrived at by the different conferences was that no nation could adopt free coinage of both metals successfully, except by international agreement. Even the most sanguine advocates of bimetallism admit this fact. In the conference of 1881 the French minister of finance, who was instrumental in having the conference called, and an ardent advocate of bimetallism, said:

In order that the metal silver may recover its former value it is indispensable that it should be freely coined side by side with gold, and as no state either wishes to stand or could stand alone in resuming such coinage, it is absolutely certain that we shall not find our way out of the present difficulties until an international bimetallic treaty shall have been concluded.

M. Cernuschi, another member of that conference, who is perhaps the ablest and most earnest advocate of a bimetallic system, says:

That the only remedy is universal bimetallism; Germany can not resell gold to become again silver, monometallic, and France can not alone, at her own risk and peril, recommence coining silver.

Bimetallism can only be rehabilitated by the co-operation of all the States, India included.

Neither India nor any State can defend itself singly; either all the States will be rescued by means of a general understanding or none will be so.

In speaking of resumption of specie payments in the United States, he says:

In order to resume it is necessary to rehabilitate silver; give the silver dollar the same value as the gold dollar. To enable this plan, however, to be adopted, it is first of all necessary to be sure that Europe will become bimetallic.

As late as 1885 he said:

So long as the bimetallic treaty proposed in 1881 by the United States and France is not accepted either by England or Germany not one silver 5-franc piece should be coined by France; not one single silver dollar should be coined by the United States. In no form, under no pretext, should silver currency be increased either in France or the United States.

These are the opinions of some of the ablest bimetallists of the world. They realize the great danger to any one nation of an adherence to a double standard and a continuance of unlimited coinage. Common sense divested of selfish interests ought to teach the advocates of bimetallism in this House that the course they are pursuing will send us to financial ruin, and to silver monometallism, just as surely as the night follows the day. It may not be this month, nor next, nor possibly next year; but when the time comes that the Secretary of the Treasury will be compelled to pay, either by legislative enactment or by reason of the payment of duties in silver or silver certificates, the principal and interest of the public debt in silver coin, then will follow the further depreciation of silver, which, being the cheaper currency, will drive the gold out of circulation, leaving us stranded on a silver basis and at the mercy of foreign countries. I tell you, gentlemen, the business people of this country are watching with the deepest interest the action of this House in the faint hope that you will do something to avert the impending crisis. If you fail to heed the warning given by our own people, as well as by the bimetallists of Europe, that no nation can stand alone on a double standard, and by your persistence you bring about the calamity which they so much dread, the responsibility as well as the condemnation of sixty millions of people will rest upon your heads.

Mr. Chairman, it has been charged that we who are not believers in a double standard, at least under existing circumstances, are anxious to demonetize silver. This is not true, and is unfair. I am sure that no advocate of a suspension of silver coinage desires its demonetization. But we believe that the continued coinage of it will create such an excess of cheap dollars as will send gold to a premium and thereby drive it out of circulation, the result of which will be to drive us to a silver basis. Instead, then, of having a double standard, we will be reduced to silver monometallism.

The advocates of unlimited silver coinage seem to lose sight of the important fact that over $600,000,000 of gold coin will be entirely withdrawn from circulation, and thereby contract the circulating medium to such an extent as to produce the most disastrous results. They also seem to forget that all commercial transactions are conducted on a gold basis. Everything that we import has to be paid for in gold or its equivalent. It is a plausible but erroneous idea of the silver advocate, who favors protection, that an abundant silver currency will raise the price of goods so as to protect the American manufacturer. It is true a plethoric currency may raise the price of goods, but when such prices are raised it makes our market a first-class one for foreign manufacturers, and thus brings more foreign products into our country to compete with our people. This was exemplified by the large amount of imports when paper money was so abundant and depreciated during the war.

There is another important fact that we must not lose sight of, that is, we import annually not less than $193,213,624, much of which is in raw materials on which there is no duty for the reason that they are not produced in our own country and are required in the manufacture of American goods. If we are remitted to a silver basis, and the manufacturer is compelled to pay for his raw material in the money he receives or to buy gold, he will pay out at the present value of the standard dollar 20 per cent. more than the value of the money he receives. This procedure will add to the cost of his goods, which the consumer will have to pay or buy imported goods to the great detriment of the productive industry and labor of our people. We are told by the advocates of silver in the Forty-fifth Congress that if we would restore it to its legal-tender character it would soon go to par with gold. What has been its history? The following table will show:

Average price of bar silver per ounce in London.

	Pence.		Pence.
1877	54 1/16	1882	51 3/16

For nearly eight years we have been coining silver at the rate of more than $2,000,000 a month; has the continued coinage and its remonetization increased its value as promised? The figures show that it has had the opposite effect; neither has this large amount of silver added to the circulation increased the business interests of the country, as the farmer, the manufacturer, the merchant, the mechanic, and the laborer can testify.

Let us examine further and ascertain if possible who is to be benefited and who is to be injured by a continuance of silver inflation. It is doubtful if anybody in the long run is benefited, not even the bonanza princes. If the United States would suspend silver coinage there would be some hope for an international agreement on a fixed ratio. But so long as we are willing to supply foreign countries with a market for their surplus silver there is not the remotest prospect for such an agreement. If we continue to coin the minimum $2,000,000 a month in addition to what we may receive from abroad, I venture to predict that it will not be long before we will be remitted to a silver standard. We will then be classed with Russia, Austria, the South American states (except Brazil), India, and Japan.

And arrayed against us in the use of the gold standard will be the powerful nations of Great Britain, the Scandinavian States, Germany, Portugal, Turkey, Egypt, Brazil, Canada, Liberia, and Australia.

But you will say that these states are using silver; that is true, but they are all under the gold standard, silver being used for subsidiary and local purposes. Now let us see who will be injured by a silver standard. The number is legion; the calamity will be national, but upon none will it fall with so heavy a weight as the working classes. Those who earn their daily bread by the labor of their hands, they are the creditors of the nation to whom is paid, according to the census report and as shown by Mr. Lacey in an able speech before this House in the last Congress, $3,000,000,000 annually.

He says:

This vast sum is no doubt much less than the sum actually paid as wages in the United States during a single year. Now, if we should cut down the purchasing power of our currency 12½ cents on the dollar, the reduction on this amount of wages would be $387,000,000—a total loss to the wage classes in one year of an amount equal to eight years output of all the silver mines of the United States. Now, in order to make a market for $46,000,000 of silver bullion, that is to increase its price by 1, 2, or 3 cents per ounce, are we willing to risk precipitating a loss of $387,000,000 annually upon the laborers, the wage receivers of the country?

But if Mr. Lacey had made his estimate at the present value of silver, the loss instead of being $387,000,000 would be over $600,000,000 annually. It may be claimed that they would get the same number of dollars as if paid in gold or its equivalent. That is true, but the purchasing power of the dollar would be diminished by the advance of everything they consume in order to meet the depreciation in the currency. This has been the experience of our country in times past and is the universal experience the world over.

The advocates of unlimited coinage claim that plenty of money will benefit the laboring classes. This greatly depends upon what kind of money it is. Cheap money benefits no one, particularly the wage-worker. Mr. J. H. Walker in an address on the perils of wage-workers shows conclusively that the periods of cheap money and inflation were detrimental to their interests. He says:

While wages slowly increased from 1861 in the number of dollars paid the workman, their purchasing power—the value of their wages measured by what they could buy—just as surely decreased. In 1860 the wages of a dyer were 67 cents a day; the total cost of food supply for a year was $225. In 1864 his wages were $1 per day; total cost of same food and supplies $441.61. By this it will be seen that the purchasing power of his dollar in 1864 was 50 cents against 67 cents in 1860. In 1860 plain weavers were paid 72 cents per day, in 1864 $1.08; they could only buy with the $1.08 what they could buy with 55 cents in 1860.

It took nearly eighteen years before their wages were worth as much as in 1860. To-day their wages are worth one-sixth more than in 1860, with a greater purchasing power. It took six years for carpenters' wages to have the same purchasing power as in 1860. Machinists who were paid $2 in 1860 and $2.50 in 1864 could only buy with their $2.50 what they could buy with $1.27½ in 1860. It was eight years before their wages were worth to them as much as 1860. To-day their wages are worth one-eighth more than in 1860. Locomotive engineers were paid $2.40 in 1860 and $2.80 in 1864, but the $2.80 would only buy as much as $1.42½ in 1860. It was ten years before their wages were worth as much as in 1860. To-day their wages are one-third more than 1860. He says:

The wages of every class the country over shows substantially the same thing.

It took in every instance from six to eight years for the wages to equal in purchasing power those of 1860; those years between 1860 and 1870 were the years of inflation and cheap money. Mr. Walker makes this estimate:

Taking the country over, and reckoning five persons to a family, it would give ten million families. Assuming that the earnings of each family be $2.50 of three hundred days, shows that the loss to the wageworkers of the country by the depreciation of the currency was $2,750,000,000, a sum equal to the public debt on August 31, 1865, its highest point, and nearly double the present debt. This loss occurred in about a period of six years. This experience of the American wageworker is precisely that of his brother in France during inflation times, excepting not so severe. There thousands of artisans and their families died of starvation; their wages, while nominally high, would not buy enough to sustain life. The history of England shows the same state of things during the clipping and debasing of her coin, and also in the times of her inflated paper currency.

From the foregoing statements it might appear that the farmer was benefited by inflation; but what affects a part injuriously will sooner or later affect the whole. The producers and consumers are to a great extent composed of the same individuals. The farmer's necessities are greater than the wage-worker's. He consumes much of the same things the wage-worker has to buy, and in addition many others. In times of inflation he is compelled to pay higher prices for labor and higher prices for the many kinds of machinery requisite to carry on his business. Nearly everything the farmer produces—namely, wheat, corn, oats, barley, wool, beef, hides, tallow, &c.—may be regarded as raw material. It has always been conceded that the producer and the consumer suffer most in times of inflation and cheap money. The farmer is the producer and the wage-worker the great consumer. Hence it is what affects one must necessarily affect the other.

One of the objections urged against suspension of silver coinage is that we want a larger circulating medium. The cry is that the Secretary of the Treasury is hoarding up the silver whilst the people are suffering for the want of it. I have no doubt some of its ardent advocates would be willing to see him sow it broadcast as the farmer sows his seed, in order to get rid of it. Let us see if this assertion of the scarcity of money is correct. It is shown by the reports of the banks at New York that money was never so plenty and the rates of interest so low; from $60,000,000 to $70,000,000 over and above the legal and necessary reserve has been much of the time lying idle in their vaults, and the rate of interest has been from 1½ per cent. to 2½ per cent. on call loans.

Only the other day, I am informed by a member of this House, the town of Springfield, Mass., borrowed on six months' time $250,000 at the rate of 2$\frac{11}{16}$ per cent. This is the experience of all other money centers; millions of capital is lying idle throughout the country for the want of safe investments at very low rates of interest. The cry for more money is a fallacy, a deception, and a cheat. We never had so much money as at present. Counting the coin and paper money authorized by the Government, we find that there is not less than one billion five hundred million of circulation. When we come to consider how little of this amount is used in the daily transactions of business it would seem that a very much less volume of circulation would serve us.

The late Comptroller of the Currency, John J. Knox, showed by actual experiments that less than 2 per cent. of coin is used in the whole volume of business done in the United States, and 94 per cent. by checks and drafts. This proves two things: First, that the people do not want coin, especially silver, as a medium of exchange, on account of being inconvenient and cumbersome; second, that $600,000,000 of gold coin is a sufficient basis for the paper circulation and the trade and commerce of the country. But in addition to this we have 218,000,000 of standard silver dollars as a legal tender. It is not the amount of money or its cheapness that makes good and prosperous times. Protection to the labor and the manufacturing interests of the country will do tenfold more to bring us back to prosperity than a cheap, depreciated currency.

They tell us that the principal and interest of the public debt is payable in coin, and that the holders thereof ought to be paid in silver. There is nothing so important to the stability of a nation as its public credit. A very large proportion of our bonded debt is paying only 3 per cent. interest. Is it at all probable that so low a rate could have been obtained if the assurance had not been given that both principal and interest would be paid in gold? When Jay Cooke & Co. undertook to place $1,000,000,000 of the bonds there had not been coined as much as nine millions of silver dollars since the formation of the Government, and that was not in circulation. It was thoroughly understood that the bonds negotiated through Jay Cooke & Co. were payable in gold; they were the Government's authorized agents and promised in all their circulars that both principal and interest would be paid in gold. Ever since that time, when the debt was many millions greater and the annual interest more than double, we have continued to pay in gold or its equivalent.

This idea of paying our bonds in depreciated currency is not a new one. The question came up in the Fortieth Congress, when it was strongly urged that the debt should be paid in legal-tenders, which were then worth only 60 to 70 cents on the dollar. The record of the Democratic party on this question was in favor of paying the "bloated bondholders" in this depreciated currency. It is not necessary to show in this argument who were the "bloated bondholders;" suffice it to say that thousands of them were widows and orphan children, many of them wards of the nation, made so by the unjustifiable war of the rebellion, which also made it neccessary to issue the bonds to pay the debt that the war created. The same gentlemen who fought to destroy the Union are here, with very few exceptions, to-day advocating the payment of these bonds, principal and interest in a currency, the depreciation of which is equal if not greater than one-fifth its nominal value, and who can tell how much lower it will fall if the Government is forced to pay in silver?

Surely this is not the way to keep faith with those patriotic people who came forward with their means in the hour of the country's peril and the country's greatest need. When her credit was so low that she could not borrow money at the close of Buchanan's administration for less than 12 per cent. they loaned their money at a much less rate of interest and at a much greater risk, but they did it to sustain the Government and preserve the Union. Shall these people who furnished the means to put down the rebellion, and who have exchanged their bonds many times since, taking each time a lower rate of interest, now be told that "We will no longer pay you in gold or its equivalent, but you must be satisfied with a depreciated currency worth only 79 cents on the dollar?" The Government can not afford to do a dishonest thing any more than a private individual; if it undertakes to force depreciated silver on the holders of the bonds, it will soon find that it will borrow no more money at 3 per cent. per annum.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the suspension of silver coinage, for the present at least, in order to give to gold the duty of settling large balances at home and abroad and remitting to silver the duty mainly of affording subsidiary coin for the smaller transactions of our people at home. While I have but little faith in a double standard I would regard it as unwise to demonetize silver, especially at this time when we have not less than 220,000,000 standard silver dollars on hand; but I would suspend its further coinage in the hope of being able to keep as large amount as possible in circulation and at par with gold, and also with the view of protecting us against the introduction of silver from abroad, and in the still further hope of an international agreement between us and the other leading nations of the world upon some fixed ratio as well as a fixed limit of the amount to be coined in proportion to gold. I am not in favor of the demonetization of silver or any other money of the United States. After having made the standard dollar a legal tender, I claim that the Government has no right to take away that quality without first passing a law for its redemption. This argument applies with equal force to the trade-dollar, which was made a limited legal tender, as well as to the standard dollar.

This brings me to a question in which many of the people of my district are deeply interested; that is, the redemption of the trade-dollar. I showed from careful investigation, in an argument in the last Congress, that the people of Pennsylvania were the holders of $2,560,927 trade-dollars and of this large amount only $123,044 were taken at a discount. I said then that the Government certainly has no just right to take away the legal-tender quality of its obligations at will; if so, it can take away with equal justice the legal-tender quality of the standard dollar. The Government has no more right to break its contracts than an individual or a corporation. This action on the part of Congress was a great injustice to the people, for it left upon their hands a mere disc of silver bullion of no more value as an instrument for the payment of debts than a silver bar. I showed that in many instances these trade-dollars were held by poor people, by merchants, farmers, and trades people, who took them at their face value and could not afford to lose.

The opposition to their redemption in the last Congress came from two opposite elements:

First. Those interested in the bullion market. They opposed it for the reason that the bill provided that the trade-dollars redeemed should be regarded as a part of the monthly purchase of silver bullion; they claimed that the effect of this would be to diminish the amount of bullion purchased.

Second. Those who favored a suspension of silver coinage opposed its redemption for the reason that the House refused to count it as a part of the monthly coinage, but passed the bill without any restriction, the effect of which would be to add five or six millions to the amount already coined. In my judgment both the elements opposed to the redemption of the trade-dollars are responsible for the loss that the people have sustained. There are at present several bills before this House providing for their redemption and recoinage, one introduced by myself, which provides that they shall be exchanged for standard dollars and then coined into subsidiary coin. As there seems to be sufficient subsidiary coin for the present, and a surplus in the Treasury, it might be better to exchange it for trade-dollars. In this way the Government would be getting 420 grains of silver for 395.8 grains of subsidiary coin. In this she would be no loser but a gainer, and the holder of the trade-dollar would gladly accept the exchange as the best way out of the difficulty.

In view of the fact that the trade-dollar was once a legal tender, made so by the act of Congress, and subsequently demonetized by it without any provision for its redemption; that several millions are still in the hands of the people who took them at their face value; that circumstances over which they had no control depressed them to their mere bullion value; that the Government would not lose in exchanging them, and on the other hand the holders will lose, if not exchanged, to the extent of 20 per cent., not counting loss in interest, I can not urge too strongly upon this Congress the duty we owe the innocent holders to redeem them.

To demonetize them without providing for their redemption was a great breach of faith on the part of the Government, and ought never to have been permitted. I am opposed to the further coinage of the standard silver dollar at this time, and do not conceive it necessary for the redemption of the trade-dollar; but if it should be, I would vote for such a bill to the extent of such redemption, believing it to be our solemn duty to relieve the people of a depreciated coin which is a mere token, worth only its value in bullion, and that the confidence of the people in this great Government of ours to pay all its obligations may not be destroyed.

But to return to the main question. Mr. Chairman, with all the facts before us, is it not time that the compulsory coinage of the silver dollar should cease? Is it not time that the illusion in favor of a double standard should be set aside? Has not the experience of all nations shown that an unrestricted coinage of both metals must result in the expulsion of one or the other metal as a currency, according to the demand or supply of either, the change of ratio, and legislation of different countries with different interests?

Our experience of the difficulty of maintaining a double standard and the futile efforts of our commissioners at two international money conferences to convince the delegates of its propriety seems to me to answer the question and to indicate the impolicy of our country in endeavoring to maintain silver at a fixed ratio with gold.

The Director of the Mint is no doubt fully satisfied that the coinage of the silver dollar should cease. His predecessors, Mr. Burchard and Mr. Linderman, were also of the opinion that a double standard could not be maintained.

Mr. Burchard, in his last report, says:

While believing that the equal coinage of both metals by all nations is desirable in order to give greater stability to the values of commodities and credits, yet in view of our inability to continue the increase of our silver circulation at the present rate without ultimately expelling a large portion of the present stock of gold, as well as of the waning hope of the co-operation of the legal commercial nations in securing the general use of silver and its unlimited coinage as money, and of the present abundant paper and increasing gold circulation, I suggest the question again for the consideration of legislators, whether the law directing the monthly coinage of not less than $2,000,000 worth of silver bullion into standard dollars should not be modified or repealed.

Coming down to the present administration we have the earnest recommendation of the President in his first annual message to this Congress, as well as the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, that the coinage of the silver dollar should cease.

It behooves us to take warning in time; gold is rapidly disappearing, as is shown by the payments of Government duties in silver coin and in the decrease of our exports to Great Britain. The English returns of trade show that our exports for the month of January, 1886, were $13,855,000 less than they were for January, 1885; and our imports were $535,000 greater for the same month (January) than for the corresponding month last year.

With our exports decreasing and our imports increasing it will not take long for the balance of trade to turn against us. It is also evident that our bonds are rapidly coming home from the London market, due no doubt to the agitation of their payment in silver. The decrease in exports, the increase in imports, and the return of our securities from abroad have occasioned the export of nearly $7,000,000 of gold within the last sixty days.

If Congress can in any way force the United States Treasurer to pay principal and interest on Government bonds in silver dollars you will soon find gold disappearing as by the hand of the magician, only to be reproduced by the payment of a premium. This will bring about a contraction of the circulating medium and the unsettling of all values to such an extent as to produce a financial crisis worse, much worse, I fear, than any this country has ever experienced.

Mr. Chairman, these are my honest convictions in relation to this important question. I shall therefore regard it as my duty to vote against House bill 5690, introduced by Mr. BLAND, which provides for free coinage, and if the opportunity offers will substitute House bill 2058, introduced by myself, which provides for the suspension of the coinage of the standard silver dollar.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CLEMENTS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CLEMENTS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had been in session for debate only under the order of the House.

And then, on motion of Mr. BLAND (at 4 o'clock and 45 minues p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

By Mr. ATKINSON: Papers relating to the claim of Samuel A. Sanderson—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BRADY: Petition of St. Ann's Infant Asylum, with recommendations of Dr. D. H. Teeple, Superintendent C. E. Dye, of police, and others, appealing for an increase of appropriation for the asylum—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BURROWS: Petition for the repeal of the limitation to arrears-of-pension act—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of G. W. Smith and others, of S. Van Hise and others, of J. T. Keables and others, of R. M. Shaffer and others, and of W. J. Martin and others, against the suspension of silver coinage—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. CUTCHEON: Memorial of D. Gerbert & Sons and others, in regard to branding cattle—to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. DINGLEY: Remonstrance of J. C. Poole and 25 others, against bill to prohibit the importation of mackerel between March 1 and June 1 of each year—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. FISHER: Memorial of Local Assembly No. 3570, of Harrison, Mich., asking for liberal appropriations for public improvements—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

By Mr. FORD: Petition of 450 citizens of Elkhart County, Indiana, praying for a pension to all honorably discharged soldiers of the late war who served sixty days or longer—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. GLASS: Petition of J. M. Atkins, of Dyer County; of David Bright, of Obion County, and of W. E. Matthews, executor of William Clements, deceased, of Gibson County, Tennessee, asking that their war claims be referred to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. GROSVENOR: Petition of John G. Davis and others, of Perry County, Ohio, in favor of the Oklahoma Bill—to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. HALSELL: Petition of David Martland and 61 others, citizens of Muhlenburg County, asking for the passage of an act prohibiting Chinese emigration to this country—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. J. T. JOHNSTON: Petition of James Hampton and 166 others, soldiers and citizens of Hendricks County; of W. W. Weatherhalt and 70 others, soldiers and citizens of Spencer County; of D. A. Miller and 172 others, soldiers and citizens of Marion County; of A. S. Henderson and 33 others, soldiers of Cook County; of John D. Johnston, George W. The following petitions, praying Congress to place the coinage of silver upon an equality with gold; that there be issued coin certificates of one, two, and five dollars, the same being made legal tender; that one and two dollar legal-tender notes be issued, and that the public debt be paid as rapidly as possible by applying for this purpose the idle surplus now in the Treasury, were presented and severally referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures:

By Mr. J. A. ANDERSON: Petition of 76 citizens of Saline County, Kansas.

SENATE.

MONDAY, March 1, 1886.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. D. HUNTLEY, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting papers showing the status of certain portions of the land included in the military reservation of Fort Missoula, Montana Territory, in regard to which legislation is desired; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 16th of December, 1885, copies of certain disallowed accounts and vouchers; which was read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What disposition shall be made of the accompanying papers?

Mr. HALE. The papers accompanying the communication in relation to the many cases of suspended accounts and vouchers are numerous and bulky, but it will be almost impossible for the Committee on Appropriations to examine them unless they are printed. I ask, therefore, that the papers accompanying the communication be printed, and that they be referred, with the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and the motion to print will be referred to the Committee on Printing under the rule.

Mr. HALE. Will there be any necessity under the rule to refer to the Committee on Printing a motion for printing the usual number of copies? I do not think that the cost would reach the sum that the rules name as the maximum which can be printed without such a reference.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MANDERSON] will be able to state as to that.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will state for the information of the Senator from Maine that under the rule such a motion goes as a matter of course to the Committee on Printing, whether to print the usual number or additional copies, unless the Senate otherwise order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the impression of the Chair. The Chair now has the rule before him.

Rule XXIX provides that—

> Every motion to print documents, reports, and other matter transmitted by either of the Executive Departments, or to print memorials, petitions, accompanying documents, or any other paper, except bills of the Senate or House of Representatives, resolutions submitted by a Senator, communications from the Legislatures or conventions, lawfully called, of the respective States, and motions to print by order of the standing or select committees of the Senate, shall, unless the Senate otherwise order, be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. HALE. Undoubtedly. I was asking that the Senate dispense with that rule and order these papers printed now, because I have made examination enough to know that no investigation of them can be made unless they are printed. Therefore I move that they be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order. By the ordinary course the motion to print would be referred to the Committee on Printing, but the Senator from Maine moves that the papers be printed without a reference to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MANDERSON. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine, as I did not hear his remarks, to state the nature of the papers.

Mr. HALE. The resolution called upon the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish to the Senate complete lists of all the numerous cases of suspended vouchers and accounts. The Senator from Nebraska, of course, is aware that since last March the accounting and comptrolling officers have taken upon themselves what seems to me an extraordinary jurisdiction, and have held up scores and hundreds of cases where persons intrusted with the funds of the Government, paymasters and other bonded officers, have paid out money in accordance with previous unbroken precedents, and the accounting officers have refused to allow the accounts, so that those officers of the Government find their accounts held up and the money which they have paid out has gone from them and they are left without recourse.

Under those conditions I introduced a resolution calling for information, and the Secretary of the Treasury has furnished the information in a large mass of accounts that need to be printed in order to be examined. Nobody would undertake to go through them, and the Committee on Appropriations would find it impossible to go through them unless they were printed; and as it is desirable to examine the subject as soon as possible, I ask that the rule be dispensed with, and that they be printed without a reference to the Committee on Printing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the communication, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that the accompanying papers be printed without a reference to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of the Lake Carriers' Association of Buffalo, N. Y., praying for the passage of Senate bill 1004, to amend the laws in regard to shipping, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I present a joint resolution of the General Assembly of Iowa, favoring the establishment of a Northwestern branch of the National Home for Disabled and Indigent Soldiers and Sailors in that State, which, without reading, I ask to have printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution and memorial of the General Assembly of Iowa, relating to a Northwestern branch of the National Home for Disabled and Indigent Soldiers and Sailors.

Whereas the policy of the General Government is to make suitable provision for the care of disabled and indigent soldiers and sailors of the civil war through the maintenance of national soldiers' homes; and

Whereas a very large number of the old soldiers and sailors at the close of the war sought residence in the Northwest, in order that they might avail themselves of the free lands of the Government and in the hope of being better able here than elsewhere to provide for the future support of themselves and families; and

Whereas the Government as yet has made no provision for the establishment of a branch of said home in the Northwest; and in view of the further fact that the homes already created are inadequate for the care of old soldiers and sailors eligible to admission: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Iowa, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be earnestly requested to exert themselves to present the needs of the soldiers and sailors of the Northwest in this regard, and to labor as their wisdom and sense of justice may dictate, to the end that provision be made by Congress for a Northwestern branch of the Soldiers' Home; and that our Senators and Representatives furthermore make all proper effort to secure the location of such Northwestern branch within the State of Iowa, as in the judgment of this General Assembly such location would best accommodate the largest number of old soldiers and sailors to whom such home would be available in time of misfortune as a just recognition of a faithful Government of their services and sacrifices in time of great national emergency.

ALBERT HEAD,
Speaker of the House.
J. A. T. HULL,
President of the Senate.

Approved February 18, 1886.
WM. LARRABEE.

I hereby certify that the above and foregoing is a true copy of the enrolled joint resolution and memorial as the same appears on file in my office.

In witness whereof I hereunto set my hand and affix the great seal of state. Done at the capitol in Des Moines, this 20th day of February, A. D. 1886, of the United States the one hundred and tenth, and of the State of Iowa the fortieth.

[SEAL.] FRANK D. JACKSON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Ellis, Kans., praying for liberal appropriations for the construction of works of internal improvement; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONGER presented a petition of the Knights of Labor Association of Harrison, Mich., praying for the construction of the Hennepin Canal and other public works so as to give employment to laboring men; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COKE presented a petition of citizens of San Jacinto County, Texas; a petition of citizens of Huntsville, Walker County, Texas; a petition of citizens of Hayes County, Texas, and a petition of citizens of Milam County, Texas, praying that an appropriation be made for the purpose of securing deep water in Galveston Harbor, Texas; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented petitions of citizens of San Augustine County, Texas, and a petition of citizens of Dallas, Tex., praying for an appropriation to secure deep water at Sabine Pass, Tex.; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HARRISON presented the petition of Thomas F. Shaw and 63 others, citizens of Moore's Hill, Ind., praying Congress to pass a joint resolution at this session submitting to the several State Legislatures a proposition to so amend the Constitution as to protect the women of all the States and Territories in the enjoyment of the right of suffrage on equal terms with men; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Dublin monthly meeting of Friends, located in Indiana, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TELLER presented a joint memorial of the General Assembly of Colorado, favoring the removal of the Southern Ute Indians from Colorado; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a joint memorial of the Legislature of Colorado, favoring the restoration of the provision of the tariff act of 1867 as regards wool; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CULLOM presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Quincy, Ill.; a petition of Knights of Labor of Geneseo, Ill.; a petition of Knights of Labor of Grape Creek, Ill.; a petition of Knights of Labor of Carbon Cliff, Ill., and a petition of Knights of Labor of Chicago, Ill., praying for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Clinton, Ill., praying for the restoration of wages at the Government Printing Office to a certain former rate; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the board of managers of the Lake Carriers' Association at a meeting held at Buffalo, N. Y., favoring the passage of Senate bill 1004, to amend the laws in regard to shipping, &c.; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the board of managers of the Lake Carriers' Association at a meeting held at Buffalo, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. 1619) to regulate the forms of bills of lading; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM. I also present resolutions, adopted by the Illinois State board of agriculture, favoring the enactment of a law placing all dairy products and all imitations of or substitutes for the same under governmental inspection, to the end that such articles shall be branded and sold under their proper names and upon their merits, and also asking legislation for the protection of the people against the adulteration of other food products by a system of thorough Government inspection. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAWES presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Milford, Brookfield, Spencer, and Newburyport, Mass., praying for the opening of Indian Territory to homestead settlement, that a Territorial form of government be provided for that Territory, and that lands in severalty be allotted to Indians; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SPOONER presented resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, Wis., favoring the Cullom interstate commerce bill, but recommending that the provision prohibiting a greater charge for a less than a greater distance be stricken out, and that the bill be amended so as to require five days' notice of reduction in freight rates before taking effect in order to protect holders of property in transit; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Department of Wisconsin, Grand Army of the Republic, praying the passage of a bill for the relief of John Calihan, late a private in Company G, One hundred and forty-seventh New York Volunteers; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Milwaukee, Wis., praying for the restoration of wages at the Government Printing Office to a certain former rate; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. MANDERSON presented a petition of citizens of Omaha, Nebr., praying for a constitutional change in the present form of government abolishing the Presidency; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. BROWN. I present a memorial from the Board of Trade of the city of Savannah, Ga., addressed to the Senators and Representatives from that State, requesting them to oppose the Morrison tariff bill in its present shape. As the memorial is short, I ask that it may be read.

The memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

SAVANNAH, GA., February 27, 1886.

DEAR SIR: The members of this board of trade, in general meeting assembled yesterday, adopted the following resolutions in opposition to the Morrison bill. Permit me, by instruction, to invite your usual careful attention to the same, which explains itself, namely:

"Whereas the tariff bill now pending in Congress, known as the Morrison bill, seems to be unjust to our section, inasmuch as more than one-half of the proposed reductions falls upon the products of a very small section of the country without any adequate reduction on articles consumed by same section: Therefore,

"Be it resolved, That we are opposed to the Morrison bill for the reason that the greatest reductions are made upon three of the four principal products of this section, namely, lumber, rice, and sugar.

"Resolved, That we are opposed to the Morrison bill for the reasons that with the present duty on rice we find it hard to compete with the foreign article, as shown by the fact that the imports of foreign rice and rice flour is already larger than the domestic products, and a further reduction would entirely destroy our profits on home products, and thus render valueless a large area of land upon which large sums of money have been expended to make it available for rice culture, and rendering it unfit for other use, and throwing out of employment a large number of our colored population, both men and women, who, by their training, are unfitted for other occupation.

"Resolved, That we urge upon our Senators and Representatives that they oppose the passage of the bill as it now stands, and that the secretary be instructed to send to each member from this State a copy of these resolutions."

(True extract from minutes.)

Yours, truly,

GEO. P. WALKER, Superintendent.

Hon. JOSEPH E. BROWN,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. HAMPTON presented five petitions of officers of the Army, praying for the passage of Senate bill 137, to organize each regiment of infantry into three battalions; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MAXEY presented a petition of the mayor and council of Dallas, Tex., praying that an appropriation be made for improving the harbor at Sabine Pass, Tex.; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GIBSON presented a petition of insurance agents of Louisiana, praying for the passage of an act to require the testing of chains and anchors, and for the better securing of life and property on shipboard; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Morgan City, La., praying for the opening of the Ohlahoma lands in the Indian Territory to settlement, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the petition of Perry Porter and a considerable number of others, ex-Union soldiers of the State of Vermont, praying that the laws relating to the bounties which were offered be so amended as that private soldiers who became entitled to the bounties and were afterwards promoted on the field for gallant service should not lose the benefit of the bounty; which seems to me to be a very just thing. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I present the petition of H. W. Brownell, a Vermont soldier and officer, praying for a pension, his claim having been rejected at the Pension Office upon grounds which appear to me to be quite technical and improper. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON presented a petition of the Knights of Labor of Mahanoy City, Schuylkill County, Pennsylvania, praying that liberal appropriations be made for internal improvements; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a memorial of great length and extraordinary inaccuracy concerning the abolition of the Presidency, which is signed by ten citizens of Kansas, all evidently of foreign birth, in which they ask for certain legislation to change the executive frame of this Government to correspond with that of certain European nations. I present this paper with pleasure, although it is based upon an entire misconception of the Constitution of the United States and an appalling ignorance of the history to which it refers. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Election.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present a petition of C. H. Hurlburt and 379 other representative citizens of the twelfth district of Indiana, including 20 physicians, 23 clergymen, 6 lawyers, 6 teachers, 167 leading business men, and 9 officers of temperance and other societies; and a petition of 203 representative citizens of Parke and Warren Counties, Indiana, praying for scientific temperance instruction in all schools under control of the National Government. It is stated that "the Church of Christ, of Metz, joins in this petition by Mr. Stewart, its pastor." I move that the petitions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH presented a petition of the Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Oregon, praying that an appropriation be made for furnishing gravestones to mark the last resting-place of deceased soldiers in the State of Oregon; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PALMER presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Battle Creek, Harmony, and Manistee, Mich., praying for the opening of the Oklahoma lands in the Indian Territory to settlement, &c.; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Charlotte A. Cleveland and 22 other citizens of Saint Louis, Mo., and the petition of Mrs. J. C. Swan and 48 other citizens of Muskegon, Mich., praying that the right of suffrage be granted to women; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Andrew F. Schafer and other citizens of Ionia, Mich., praying for the restoration of wages at the Government Printing Office to a certain former rate; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of East Saginaw, Mich., praying for the restriction of Chinese immigration and labor; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a memorial of James G. Edwards, M. W., and E. Beal, R. S., of the Local Assembly 717 of the Knights of Labor of Bevier, in the county of Macon, State of Missouri, in regard to alleviating the distress everywhere prevalent among the laboring classes of the civilized world, and praying for the construction of the Hennepin Canal. The petition was sent to my colleague [Mr. VEST], and owing to his illness has been sent to me to be presented. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL presented a petition of citizens of Jasper County, Missouri, praying for the opening of the Oklahoma lands in the Indian Territory to settlement, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Kirksville, Mo., praying for the passage of the bill introduced by Mr. FORAN in the House for the restoration of wages at the Government Printing Office to a certain former rate; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. LOGAN. I present the petition of Capt. Dixon Shirault, of Virginia, who claims that after having been in the service of the Government as a light-house watchman for forty years and upward, and being old and poor, he was removed for no cause whatever. He desires Congress to take into consideration his situation and to see whether he can be pensioned. Although he asks for a pension, I think the Committee on Commerce would be the proper committee to consider the matter, and I move the reference of the petition to that committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Bloomington, Ill., Pekin, Ill., Staunton, Ill., and Galesburg, Ill., praying for the opening of the Oklahoma lands in Indian Territory to settlement, &c.; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented petitions of citizens of Cross Roads, Ill., citizens of Franklin County, Ill., and of ex-Union soldiers, praying for legislation in accordance with recommendations of the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Petersburg, Ill., praying for the restoration of wages at the Government Printing Office to a certain former rate; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented the petition of John M. Davis, late a captain in Company H, Sixty-third Illinois Infantry Volunteers, praying to be restored to his former rank; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Streator, Tuscola, Pekin, Staunton, and Carbon Cliff, Ill., praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Norfolk and Portsmouth, Va., praying that Congress authorize the appointment of an agent at Portsmouth to assist claimants in that locality to secure pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens residing in different parts of the United States, praying that the Government adopt a certain financial policy; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 4838) to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels, and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. FRYE. That is a House bill, and it provides, together with the amendments which the Committee on Commerce have recommended, for everything which is called for in Senate bill No. 1004. I therefore report back the bill (S. 1004) to abolish certain fees for official services to American vessels, and to amend the laws relating to shipping commissioners, seamen, and owners of vessels, and for other purposes, and move that it be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 511) to provide for the settlement of accounts with certain railway companies, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment:

A bill (S. 117) making an appropriation for the extension and enlargement of the United States custom-house at Kansas City, Mo.; and

A bill (S. 1474) for the extension and repair of the public building at Belfast, Me.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE SENATE AND EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

Mr. PUGH. I am instructed by the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary to ask leave to submit their views upon the resolution which was referred to that committee, upon which a majority report has been made, in relation to the office of district attorney for the southern district of Alabama. I ask that the minority report be printed for the use of the Senate. I make the motion to print it for the use of the Senate in the usual form; and I ask also that the views of the minority be printed in the RECORD, and lie on the table in the mean time, to be called up when the majority report is considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama, from the minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, asks leave to submit the views of the minority, and that they may be printed as a document, and also in the RECORD. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made. The views will lie upon the table.

Mr. PUGH. To be called up when the majority report is considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The majority report is on the Calendar, and this will take its place with that.

Mr. PUGH. Let it take its place with the majority report on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be placed on the Calendar with the majority report.

The views of the minority are as follows:

Mr. PUGH, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted the following:

Views of the minority on the letter of the Attorney-General of the United States declining to transmit to the Senate copies of official records and papers concerning the examination of the office of the district attorney of the southern district of Alabama.

The minority of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a letter from the Attorney-General of the United States declining to transmit to the Senate copies of official records and papers concerning the administration of the office of the district attorney of the southern district of Alabama from January 1, 1885, to January 25, 1886, respectfully submit the following report:

When President Cleveland came into office he found at least 95 per cent. of the civil offices of the United States filled by Republicans, who had enjoyed their honors and emoluments through a period of twenty years, and as a rule these public positions had been distributed as rewards for partisan service, which the recipients continued to render after their appointment.

The President was elected on the declaration that civil office was a public trust, to be so treated by incumbents in practice as well as in theory; and also upon the conviction of a majority of the people that it was a standing menace to the honesty, purity, and safety of the Government to perpetuate in these offices partisan officials who had procured their positions by partisan service, and employed their emoluments, power, and influence for personal gain and as aids in securing party supremacy.

The party to whom the President owes his nomination and election had been exiled from all participation in the civil administration of the Government for nearly a quarter of a century, and it seemed reasonable and just that the five millions of voters who had been thus politically ostracized should be allowed at least a fair share of the offices which had been created for the benefit of the whole people, without regard to party divisions. The friends and supporters of the President made application to him for a redistribution of the public trusts under the Government, so that they might receive, not as the spoils of victory, but as public honors and emoluments, at least a fair share of what was then monopolized by his political opponents, who were and had been unfriendly to Democratic principles, and could not be trusted as agents to promote the usefulness and success of Democratic administration.

No other President has ever been subjected to such severe trial or had to meet so many grave difficulties since he entered upon the discharge of the duties of his high office. No other President has ever had, in quantity and quality, such an abundant supply of valid reasons and causes urging him to a free exercise of his power of removal from Federal office; and no other President ever resisted with more firmness the just claims of his supporters, or used his power of removal more conscientiously, cautiously, and sparingly. Nearly twelve months have elapsed since the President's inauguration, and six hundred and fifty will more than cover the whole number of removals or suspensions. Had the number reached as many thousands as hundreds he would not by this time have made an equal division between the two national parties of the offices not embraced in the civil service law.

Notwithstanding these undeniable facts and circumstances, the six hundred and fifty nominations sent to the Senate in the suspension cases made during the recess of the Senate have been allowed to remain before the committees without consideration and final disposition. In the able and ingenious report of the majority of the committee, the Senate and the country are informed for the first time of the grounds and reasons for such long delay and non-action. The basis and justification for this remarkable procedure, by which suspension cases are to be postponed an indefinite period, and important legislative business interrupted, and no purpose served but to agitate and distract the public mind, is the suspension of Duskin from the powers and duties of the office of district attorney of the southern district of Alabama, whose term of office has long since expired, and the nomination of Burnett to take the place. Duskin has made no complaint to the Judiciary Committee, the Senate, the President, or the Attorney-General, that he was wronged by the suspension. The Judiciary Committee is in possession of full information showing that Burnett was recommended to the President by all the members of Congress from Alabama on personal knowledge of his high character and qualifications for the office; and that since he has been in discharge of its duties he has the unqualified indorsement of the judge and clerk of the district court of the United States, both Republicans.

The resolution of the Senate directs the Attorney-General "to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States for the southern district of Alabama." The answer of the Attorney-General is that—

"The papers and documents which are mentioned in said resolution and still remaining in the custody of the Department have exclusive reference to the suspension by the President of George M. Duskin, the late incumbent of the office of district attorney for the southern district of Alabama, and it is not considered that the public interest will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session."

Stripped to the naked truth, without any special pleading, the case made for the decision of the Senate on their resolution and the answer of the Attorney-General is whether the Senate has the right to demand of the Attorney-General the transmission against the order of the President of the only paper or document of the description mentioned in the resolution when that paper or document is stated in the refusal to relate exclusively to the removal of Duskin by the President, and for that reason alone not transmitted. The paper shows on its face to what it relates, and it requires the exercise of no judgment to determine its character. The President holds that it is not a public document, and there can be no doubt about the correctness of his decision, which must be accepted as conclusive.

It is an undeniable truth, without qualification or exception in any case, that every right, power, privilege, or prerogative created by any law or granted in the Constitution to Congress or any department or officer of the Government has some just reason, use, necessity, or foundation for its existence and support. The majority of the Judiciary Committee in their report affirm the right of the Senate, in executive session or in open session, to direct the Attorney-General or any head of a Department, or to request the President, to transmit to the Senate, in open or executive session, any paper on the files of the Department or in the possession of the President if such paper relates to an "official act" of the President or the head of any Department, although such "official act" is the removal or suspension by the President of a civil officer of the United States.

The minority deny that the claim of the majority of the committee in the case now before the Senate or in any case where the paper or document relates exclusively or materially to removals or suspensions by the President has any foundation or recognition to support it in the Constitution or any valid law, custom, or precedent. The burden rests upon the majority of the committee of showing that the right or power exists in the Senate under the Constitution or some law, custom, or precedent, and the reason, use, or necessity for it to direct the head of any Department, or to request the President to send to the Senate, in open or executive session, any paper or document in the President's possession or on the files of any of the Departments, not public, but relating exclusively or materially to his official act of removal or suspension of a civil officer of the United States.

It is difficult for the minority to decide what unmistakable rights, powers, or prerogatives are claimed for the Senate in the report of the majority that are controverted in this proceeding, or that have any bearing, application, or significance whatsoever to the real issue joined between the Senate and the President. The committee seems to think that it strengthens their claim to the papers and documents in question that the order to transmit them is made by the Senate upon the head of a Department. It is broadly asserted in the majority report that "it is within the constitutional competency of either House of Congress to have access to the official papers and documents in the various public offices." If it is not intended by the majority that this "constitutional competency of either House of Congress to have access to official papers and documents in the various public offices" should embrace papers and documents relating exclusively to removals and suspensions by the President, why make the claim of right in the two Houses so sweeping and comprehensive?

It is admitted in the majority report that no statute confers the right on either House to direct the Attorney-General to send to either House any official papers and documents, but the committee claims that the right exists "as a necessary incident from the very nature of the powers intrusted by the Constitution to the two Houses of Congress," "that either House must have at all times the right to know all that officially exists or takes place in any of the Departments of the Government." Can any grant of power in the Constitution to either House of Congress be found "that in its very nature requires that either House should have at all times the right to know anything, wherever or in whatever form it may exist, about removals or suspensions of Federal officers by the President?

The minority admit once for all that any and every public document, paper, or record on the files of any Department or in the possession of the President relating to any subject whatever over which either House of Congress has any grant of power, jurisdiction, or control under the Constitution is subject to the call or inspection of either House for use in the exercise of its constitutional powers and jurisdiction. It is on this clearly defined and well-founded constitutional principle that wherever any power is lodged by the Constitution all incidents follow such power that are necessary and proper to enable the custodian of it to carry it into execution. Whether the power is granted to Congress, or either House, or to the President, or any Department or officer of the Government, or to the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the principle is as fundamental as the Constitution itself that all the necessary incidents of such grants accompany the grants and belong to and can be exercised by the custodians of such powers jointly or severally as they may be vested by the Constitution.

It is on the application and enforcement of this unquestioned rule of construction that either House of Congress has the right, inherent in the power itself, to direct the head of any Department or request the President to transmit any information in the knowledge of either, or any public or official papers or documents, or their contents, on the files or in the keeping of either; provided such papers or documents relate to subject-matters or things in the consideration of which the House making the call can use such information, papers, or documents in the exercise of any right, power, jurisdiction, or privilege granted to Congress or either House, or to the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

But if all the power granted in the Constitution over the subject-matter or thing to which papers or documents relate, wherever they may be found, is vested by the Constitution in the President exclusively, the only rightful custodian of all such papers or documents, or the information they contain, is the chief executive officer to whom the Constitution has intrusted all the power its framers were willing to grant over that subject. It would be a reflection upon the common sense of the framers of the Constitution to decide that they had vested in the President and the Senate all the power to make and ratify treaties, and while withholding from the House of Representatives all such power they had granted by implication to the House of Representatives the right to have access to all the papers and documents upon which the President and Senate had acted in making and ratifying treaties.

Why was the possession or inspection of such papers and documents by the House of Representatives refused by President Washington? For the plain reason that the House of Representatives had no power over treaty-making. It would be equally unreasonable to conclude that the framers of the Constitution had declined to divide the power of removing Federal officers between the President and Senate, and, after vesting all such greater power of removal (if it has been done) in the President alone, they should at the same time give to the Senate by implication or as a necessary incident of another power the less right of advising and consenting to removals. That would amount to vesting the principal power of removal in the President and imposing a limitation upon it to be found as a mere incident of another and different power, of advising and consenting to appointments.

The view enforced by the minority in this report of the vital and paramount question presented from the committee to the Senate makes it unnecessary to notice the attempt of the majority to make something out of the fact that the resolution of the Senate is directed to the Attorney-General, and that as he is an officer created by a law of Congress, either House has just as much power over him as the President, except to say that if such reasoning is sound it would compel the Secretary of State to transmit to the House of Representatives on its order all papers and documents relating to the making and ratifying of treaties on file in the State Department, which is also the creation of a law of Congress. Besides, the effort to place the duty of transmitting the papers called for to the Senate upon the head of a Department, as separate and distinct from the President, or to say this is not the act of the President, is not permissible. The President speaks or acts through the heads of the several Departments in relation to subjects which appertain to their respective duties. This principle is recognized by the Supreme Court in Wilcox vs. Jackson, 13 Peters, 513, and many subsequent decisions.

Without circumlocution, or evasion, or generalizing, or dealing in subtilties, or refining on irrelevant and misleading cases cited in the majority report, the minority of your committee, after making as diligent a search as time and opportunity allowed, feel satisfied that from 1789 to 1867, a period of seventy-eight years, not a single case can be found and not a single case occurred in which the Senate in executive session by resolution or otherwise directed the head of any Department or requested the President to transmit to the Senate in executive session papers or documents on file, or in the custody of the head of the Department, or the President, relating exclusively or materially to removals of Federal officers by the President during the recess or the sessions of the Senate, and such resolution was obeyed by any head of a Department or the President. To meet the case squarely the minority feel the utmost confidence in stating that during a period of seventy-eight years, from 1789 to 1867, no such resolution as that now before the Senate was ever obeyed by the President or any head of a Department. The majority of the committee says:

"The instances of requests to the President and commands to the heads of Departments by each House of Congress from those days until now for papers and information on every conceivable subject of public affairs are almost innumerable; for it appears to have been thought by all the Presidents who have carried on the Government now for almost a century that even in respect of requests to them, an independent and co-ordinate branch of the Government, they were under a constitutional duty and obligation to furnish to either House the papers called for, unless, as has happened in very rare instances, when the request was coupled with an appeal to the discretion of the President in respect to the danger of publicity to send the papers, if in his judgment it should not be incompatible with the public welfare."

Is this broad statement made as an authority for the call on the Attorney-General to send to the Senate in executive session the papers in his Department relating exclusively to the suspension of Duskin by the President? If not, what purpose is intended to be served by the statement? If intended to sustain the present call on the Attorney-General, would it not be a remarkable coincidence that Washington, who signed the act of Congress declaratory of the exclusive right of the President to make removals, and Madison, whose matchless powers were devoted to the passage of that act, intended, as he declared in the debate, as a "permanent settlement of the constitutional power of the President to make removals within his discretion without accountability to the Senate" to obey requests, or for his Cabinet officers to obey demands for the transmission of papers to the Senate in executive session, or to either House in open session, relating exclusively to an "official act" or removal, over which he believed he had been intrusted with the sole power by the Constitution? And would it not be equally inexplicable that such a request or demand would have been obeyed by John Quincy Adams or by Andrew Jackson "in times of the highest party excitement and stress in 1826 and 1835?" If Adams and Jackson were willing to obey such requests and demands, or ever did so, why did Mr. Benton, in 1826, and Mr. Calhoun, in 1835, report bills to the Senate requiring the President to transmit to the Senate the cause of removals and the papers relating thereto, which bills fell still born on the table of the Senate?

It is not true that a single precedent can be found for a continuous period of seventy-eight years that gives any support whatever to the present demand of the Senate upon the Attorney-General to transmit papers relating exclusively to the removal of Duskin.

Every precedent cited in the report of the majority has for its foundation the constitutional power of the Senate to participate with the President in the official act to which the papers called for related. The Senate shares with the President the treaty making power, and he can make no appointment to office without the advice and consent of the Senate. Upon the subjects of treaty making and appointments papers relating thereto when requested or demanded have been sent to the Senate, for the plain reason that the President and Senate are jointly intrusted with powers in relation to treaties and appointments which the Senate can not safely and wisely exercise without the inspection of papers and documents relating thereto in the Departments or in the keeping of the President. No such foundation, reason, or necessity exists in the matter of removals from office.

The demand in the present case upon the Attorney-General and its persistent pressure by the majority of the committee, after he has declined, on the order of the President, to obey it, for the sole reason that the only papers in his Department filed there since January 1, 1885, relate exclusively to the removal of Duskin by the President, necessarily implies that in the judgment of a majority of the committee the Senate has the same constitutional power over removals that it has over appointments—that is the power of advising and consenting thereto. There is no escape from this crucial test of who is in the right in this controversy, the Senate or the President.

The question is the same as that presented in the first Congress in 1789; revived in the Senate in 1826; pressed again in the Senate in 1835; revived again in 1867, when the President was hampered by unconstitutional legislation forced through Congress by a revolutionary majority under the pressure of overruling party necessity; soon revived again by President Grant in 1869, and ending in reactionary legislation restoring the power and calling it "suspension" from office to the "discretion" of the President, and thereby conferring upon him the power, if he wills to exercise it, of expelling permanently from office any incumbent, with or without cause, and in defiance of any power in the Senate to prevent the President from making the suspension perpetual. The same old struggle again comes up in this Senate without provocation or any meritorious excuse or justification. In self-defense the President and the friends of his constitutional prerogative in the Senate are again forced to meet and answer the question, Where does the power of making removals from Federal office reside? Does the Constitution answer this question? All it says is:

(1) "The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America."

(2) "He shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur; and he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law; but the Congress may by law vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of Departments."

(3) "The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session."

(4) "He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed, and shall commission all the officers of the United States."

The question of the meaning of the above quotations from the Constitution, and what disposition, if any, they make of the power of removing officers of the United States, came up for consideration and settlement by the first Congress in May, 1789. There were many framers of the Constitution in that Congress, and none of them had more to do in that great work, or were more familiar with its meaning than Mr. Madison. This debate, considered the most remarkable in the history of Congress, is published in Annals of Congress, 1789, volume 1, from pages 372 to 585.

The minority of your committee are satisfied that they are unable to produce anything themselves, or from others, that can add to what was said in that famous debate on the question reported to the Senate. The decision was made by statesmen fresh from the work of framing the Constitution, and at a time when no political parties had been organized to influence judgment and control opinion. No settlement of any controverted question ever had higher sanctions or more to commend it to unquestioned acquiescence.

Said Mr. Madison:

"However various the opinions which exist upon the point now before us, it seems agreed on all sides that it demands a careful investigation and full discussion. I feel the importance of the question, and know that our decision will involve the decision of all similar cases. The decision that is at this time made will become the permanent exposition of the Constitution; and on a permanent exposition of the Constitution will depend the genius and character of the whole Government."

The following are extracts from some of the speeches made on that memorable occasion:

Mr. Madison said: "I think it absolutely necessary that the President should have the power of removing from office; it will make him, in a peculiar manner, responsible for their conduct, and subject him to impeachment himself if he suffers them to perpetrate with impunity high crimes or misdemeanors against the United States, or neglects to superintend their conduct, so as to check their excesses. On the constitutionality of the declaration I have no manner of doubt.

"It is said that it comports with the nature of things, that those who appoint should have the power of removal; but I can not conceive that this sentiment is warranted by the Constitution. I believe it would be found very inconvenient in practice. It is one of the most prominent features of the Constitution, a principle that pervades the whole system, that there should be the highest possible degree of responsibility in all the executive officers thereof. Anything, therefore, which tends to lessen this responsibility is contrary to its spirit and intention, and unless it is saddled upon us expressly by the letter of that work I shall oppose the admission of it into any act of the Legislature.

"Now, if the heads of the Executive Departments are subjected to removal by the President, we have in him security for the good behavior of the officer. If he does not conform to the judgment of the President in doing the executive duties of his office he can be displaced. This makes him responsible to the great executive power, and makes the President responsible to the public for the conduct of the person he has nominated and appointed to aid him in the administration of his department. But if the President shall join in a collusion with this officer, and continue a bad man in office, the case of impeachment will reach the culprit and drag him forth to punishment.

"But if you take the other construction, and say he shall not be displaced but by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the President is no longer answerable for the conduct of the officer; all will depend upon the Senate. You here destroy a real responsibility without obtaining even the shadow; for no gentleman will pretend to say the responsibility of the Senate can be of such a nature as to afford substantial security. But why, it may be asked, was the Senate joined with the President in appointing to office, if they have no responsibility? I answer, merely for the sake of advising, being supposed, from their nature, better acquainted with the character of the candidates than an individual; yet even here the President is held to the responsibility—he nominates, and, with their consent, appoints. No person can be forced upon him as an assistant by any other branch of the Government.

"There is another objection to this construction, which I consider of some weight, and shall therefore mention to the committee. Perhaps there was no argument urged with more success, or more plausibly grounded against the Constitution, under which we are now deliberating, than that founded on the mingling of the executive and legislative branches of the Government in one body. It has been objected that the Senate have too much of the executive power even by having a control over the President in the appointment to office.

"Now, shall we extend this connection between the legislative and executive departments, which will strengthen the objection and diminish the responsibility we have in the head of the Executive?"

Mr. Sedgwick (volume 1, First Congress, page 400): "But they say the Senate is to be united with the President in the exercise of this power. I hope, sir, this is not the case; because it would involve us in the most serious difficulty. Suppose a discovery of any of those events which I have just enumerated were to take place when the Senate is not in session, how is the remedy to be applied? This is a serious consideration, and the evil could be avoided no other way than by the Senate sitting always. Surely no gentleman of this House contemplates the necessity of incurring such an expense. I am sure it will be very objectionable to our constituents; and yet this must be done, or the public interest be endangered by keeping an unworthy officer in place until that body shall be assembled from the extremes of the Union.

"It has been said that there is danger of this power being abused if exercised by one man. Certainly the danger is as great with respect to the Senate, who are assembled from various parts of the continent, with different impressions and opinions. It appears to me that such a body is more likely to misuse this power than the man whom the united voice of America calls to the Presidential chair. As the nature of the Government requires the power of removal, I think it is to be exercised in this way by a hand capable of exerting itself with effect, and the power must be conferred upon the President by the Constitution, as the executive officer of the Government."

Mr. Madison said (page 463):

"The Constitution affirms that the executive power shall be vested in the President. Are there exceptions to this proposition? Yes, there are. The Constitution says that in appointing to office the Senate shall be associated with the President, unless in the case of inferior officers, when the law shall otherwise direct. Have we a right to extend this exception? I believe not. If the Constitution has invested all executive power in the President, I venture to assert that the Legislature has no right to diminish or modify his executive authority. The question now resolves itself into this: Is the power of displacing an executive power? I conceive that if any power whatsoever is in its nature executive it is the power of appointing, overseeing, and controlling those who execute the laws.

"If the Constitution had not qualified the power of the President in appointing to office, by associating the Senate with him in that business, would it not be clear that he would have the right, by virtue of his executive power, to make such appointment? Should we be authorized, in defiance of that clause in the Constitution 'The executive power shall be vested in a President,' to unite the Senate with the President in the appointment to office? I conceive not. If it is admitted that we should not be authorized to do this, I think it may be disputed whether we have a right to associate them in removing persons from office, the one power being as much of an executive nature as the other; and the first only is authorized by being excepted out of the general rule established by the Constitution in these words: 'The executive power shall be vested in the President.'

"The judicial power is vested in a Supreme Court; but will gentlemen say the judicial power can be placed elsewhere, unless the Constitution has made an exception? The Constitution justifies the Senate in exercising a judiciary power in determining on impeachments; but can the judicial power be further blended with the powers of that body? They can not. I therefore say it is incontrovertible, if neither the legislative nor judicial powers are subjected to qualifications, other than those demanded in the Constitution, that the executive powers are equally unabatable as either of the others; and inasmuch as the power of removal is of an executive nature, and not affected by any constitutional exception, it is beyond the reach of the legislative body.

Mr. Clymer said (page 489):

"If I were to give my vote merely on constitutional ground, I should be totally indifferent whether the words were struck out or not; because I am clear that the Executive has the power of removal as incident to his department; and if the Constitution had been silent with respect to the appointment, he would have had that power also. The reason, perhaps, why it was mentioned in the Constitution was to give some further security against the introduction of improper men into office. But in cases of removal there is not such necessity for this check. What great danger would arise from the removal of a worthy man when the Senate must be consulted in the appointment of his successor? Is it likely they will consent to advance an improper character? The presumption therefore is, that he would not abuse this power; or, if he did, only one good man would be changed for another.

"If the President is divested of his power his responsibility is destroyed; you prevent his efficiency and disable him from affording security to the people which the Constitution contemplates. What use will it be of to call the citizens of the Union together every four years to obtain a purified choice of a representative if he is to be a mere cipher in the Government? The Executive must act by others, but you reduce him to a mere shadow when you control both the power of appointment and removal. If you take away the latter power he ought to resign the power of superintending and directing the executive parts of the Government into the hands of the Senate at once, and then we become a dangerous aristocracy, or shall be more destitute of energy than any government on earth. These being my sentiments, I wish the clause to stand as a legislative declaration that the power of removal is constitutionally vested in the President."

Mr. Madison said (page 495):

"However various the opinions which exist upon the point now before us, it seems agreed on all sides that it demands a careful investigation and full discussion. I feel the importance of the question, and know that our decision will involve the decision of all similar cases. The decision that is at this time made will become the permanent exposition of the Constitution; and on a permanent exposition of the Constitution will depend the genius and character of the whole Government. It will depend, perhaps, on this decision whether the Government shall retain that equilibrium which the Constitution intended, or take a direction toward aristocracy or anarchy among the members of the Government. Hence how careful ought we to be to give a true direction to a power so critically circumstanced.

"It is incumbent on us to weigh with particular attention the arguments which have been advanced in support of the various opinions with cautious deliberation. I own to you, Mr. Chairman, that I feel great anxiety upon this question; I feel an anxiety, because I am called upon to give a decision in a case that may affect the fundamental principles of the Government under which we act and liberty itself. But all that I can do on such an occasion is to weigh well everything advanced on both sides with the purest desire to find out the true meaning of the Constitution, and to be guided by that and any attachment to the true spirit of liberty, whose influence I believe strongly predominates here.

"Several constructions have been put upon the Constitution relative to the point in question. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Sherman] has advanced a doctrine which was not touched upon before. He seems to think (if I understood him rightly) that the power of displacing from office is subject to legislative discretion, because, it having a right to create, it may limit or modify as it thinks proper. I shall not say but at first view this doctrine may seem to have some plausibility. But when I consider that the Constitution clearly intended to maintain a marked distinction between the legislative, executive, and judicial powers of Government; and when I consider that, if the Legislature has a power such as is contended for, they may subject and transfer at discretion powers from one department of our Government to another; they may on that principle exclude the President altogether from exercising any authority in the removal of officers; they may give it to the Senate alone, or the President and Senate combined; they may vest it in the whole Congress, or they may reserve it to be exercised by this House—when I consider the consequences of this doctrine and compare them with the true principles of the Constitution I own that I can not subscribe to it.

"The doctrine, however, which seems to stand most in opposition to the principles I contend for is, that the power to annul an appointment is, in the nature of things, incidental to the power which makes the appointment. I agree that if nothing more was said in the Constitution than that the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, should appoint to office, there would be a great force in saying that the power of removal resulted by a natural implication from the power of appointing. But there is another part of the Constitution no less explicit than the one on which the gentleman's doctrine is founded; it is that part which declares that the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States. The association of the Senate with the President in exercising that particular function is an exception to this general rule; and exceptions to general rules, I conceive, are ever to be taken strictly.

"But there is another part of the Constitution which inclines, in my judgment, to favor the construction I put upon it: the President is required to take care that the laws be faithfully executed. If the duty to see the laws faithfully executed be required at the hands of the Executive Magistrate, it would seem that it was generally intended he should have that species of power which is necessary to accomplish that end. Now, if the officer when once appointed is not to depend upon the President for his official existence, but upon a distinct body (for where there are two negatives required, either can prevent the removal), I confess I do not see how the President can take care that the laws be faithfully executed. It is true, by a circuitous operation he may obtain an impeachment, and even without this it is possible he may obtain the concurrence of the Senate for the purpose of displacing an officer; but would this give that species of control to the Executive Magistrate which seems to be required by the Constitution?

"I own, if my opinion was not contrary to that entertained by what I suppose to be the minority on this question, I should be doubtful of being mistaken, when I discovered how inconsistent that construction would make the Constitution with itself. I can hardly bring myself to imagine the wisdom of the convention who framed the Constitution contemplated such incongruity. There is another maxim which ought to direct us in expounding the Constitution, and is of great importance. It is laid down in most of the constitutions or bills of rights in the republics of America; it is to be found in the political writings of the most celebrated civilians, and is everywhere held as essential to the preservation of liberty, that the three great departments of government be kept separate and distinct; and if in any case they are blended, it is in order to admit a partial qualification, in order more effectually to guard against an entire consolidation.

"I think, therefore, when we review the several parts of this Constitution, where it says that the legislative powers shall be vested in a Congress of the United States under certain exceptions, and the executive power vested in the President with certain exceptions, we must suppose they were intended to be kept separate in all cases in which they are not blended, and ought, consequently, to expound the Constitution so as to blend them as little as possible. Everything relative to the merits of the question as distinguished from a constitutional question seems to turn on the danger of such a power vested in the President alone. But when I consider the checks under which he lies in the exercise of this power, I own to you I feel no apprehensions but what arise from the dangers incidental to the power itself; for dangers will be incidental to it vest it where you please.

"I will not reiterate what was said before with respect to the mode of election, and the extreme improbability that any citizen will be selected from the mass of citizens who is not highly distinguished by his abilities and worth; in this alone we have no small security for the faithful exercise of this power. But, throwing that out of the question, let us consider the restraints he will feel after he is placed in that elevated station. It is to be remarked that the power in this case will not consist so much in continuing a bad man in office as in the danger of displacing a good one. Perhaps the great danger, as has been observed, of abuse in the executive power lies in the improper continuance of bad men in office. But the power we contend for will not enable him to do this; for if an unworthy man be continued in office by an unworthy President, the House of Representatives can at any time impeach him, and the Senate can remove him, whether the President chooses or not.

"The danger then consists merely in this: The President can displace from office a man whose merits require that he should be continued in it. What will be the motives which the President can feel for such abuse of his power and the restraints that operate to prevent it? In the first place, he will be impeachable by this House, before the Senate, for such an act of mal-administration; for I contend that the wanton removal of meritorious officers would subject him to impeachment and removal from his own high trust. But what can be his motives for displacing a worthy man? It must be that he may fill the place with an unworthy creature of his own. Can he accomplish this end? No; he can place no man in the vacancy whom the Senate shall not approve; and if he could fill the vacancy with the man he might choose, I am sure he would have little inducement to make an improper removal. Let us consider the consequences. The injured man will be supported by the popular opinion; the community will take sides with him against the President; it will facilitate those combinations, and give success to those exertions which will be pursued to prevent his re-election.

"To displace a man of high merit, and who from his station may be supposed a man of extensive influence, are considerations in the mind of any man who may fill the Presidential chair. The friends of those individuals and the public sympathy will be against him. If this should not produce his impeachment before the Senate, it will amount to an impeachment before the community, who will have the power of punishment by refusing to re-elect him. But suppose this persecuted individual can not obtain revenge in this mode; there are other modes in which he could make the situation of the President very inconvenient, if you suppose him resolutely bent on executing the dictates of resentment. If he had not influence enough to direct the vengeance of the whole community, he may probably be able to obtain an appointment in one or the other branch of the Legislature, and being a man of weight, talents, and influence, in either case he may prove to the President troublesome indeed.

"We have seen examples in the history of other nations, which justify the remark I now have made. Though the prerogatives of the British king are great as his rank, and it is unquestionably known that he has a positive influence over both branches of the legislative body, yet there have been examples in which the appointment and removal of ministers have been found to be dictated by one or other of those branches. Now if this be the case with an hereditary monarch, possessed of those high prerogatives and furnished with so many means of influence, can we suppose a President, elected for four years only, dependent upon the popular voice, impeachable by the Legislature, little if at all distinguished for wealth, personal talents, or influence from the head of the department himself—I say, will he bid defiance to all these considerations and wantonly dismiss a meritorious and virtuous officer? Such abuse of power exceeds my conception. If anything takes place in the ordinary course of business of this kind, my imagination can not extend to it on any rational principle.

"But let us not consider the question on one side only; there are dangers to be contemplated on the other. Vest this power in the Senate jointly with the President, and you abolish at once that great principle of unity and responsibility in the executive department which was intended for the security of liberty and the public good. If the President should possess alone the power of removal from office, those who are employed in the execution of the law will be in their proper situation, and the chain of dependence be preserved; the lowest officers, the middle grade, and the highest will depend, as they ought, on the President, and the President on the community. The chain of dependence, therefore, terminates in the supreme body, namely, in the people, who will possess, besides, in aid of their original power, the decisive engine of impeachment.

"Take the other supposition, that the power should be vested in the Senate, on the principle that the power to displace is necessarily connected with the power to appoint. It is declared by the Constitution that we may by law vest the appointment of inferior officers in the heads of Departments, the power of removal being incidental, as stated by some gentlemen. Where does this terminate? If you begin with the subordinate officers, they are dependent on their superior, he on the next superior, and he on—whom? On the Senate, a permanent body; a body, by its particular mode of election, in reality existing for ever; a body possessing that proportion of aristocratic power which the Constitution no doubt thought wise to be established in the system but which some have strongly excepted against.

"And let me ask, gentlemen, is there equal security in this case as in the other? Shall we trust the Senate, responsible to individual Legislatures, rather than the person who is responsible to the whole community? It is true, the Senate do not hold their offices for life, like aristocracies recorded in the historic page; yet the fact is, they will not possess that responsibility for the exercise of executive powers which would render it safe for us to vest such powers in them. But what an aspect will this give to the Executive? Instead of keeping the departments of Government distinct, you make an executive out of one branch of the Legislature; you make the Executive a two-headed monster, to use the expression of the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. Livermore], you destroy the great principle of responsibility, and perhaps have the creature divided in its will, defeating the very purposes for which a unity in the Executive was instituted.

"These objections do not lie against such an arrangement as the bill establishes. I conceive that the President is sufficiently accountable to the community; and if this power is vested in him, it will be vested where its nature requires it should be vested; if anything in its nature is executive, it must be that power which is employed in superintending and seeing that the laws are faithfully executed. The laws can not be executed but by officers appointed for that purpose. Therefore, those who are over such officers naturally possess the executive power. If any other doctrine be admitted, what is the consequence? You may set the Senate at the head of the executive department, or you may require that the officers hold their places during the pleasure of this branch of the Legislature, if you can not go so far as to say we shall appoint them; and by this means you link together two branches of the Government which the preservation of liberty requires to be constantly separated."

The following are the judicial recognitions and sanctions of the validity and binding character of the settlement made of this great question in 1789. Chancellor Kent, in his Commentaries, volume 1, tenth edition, page 346, uses the following language:

"This (meaning the settlement in 1789) amounted to a legislative construction of the Constitution, and it has ever since been acquiesced in and acted upon as of decisive authority in the case. It applies equally to every other officer of Government appointed by the President and Senate whose term of duration is not specially declared. It is supported by the weighty reason that the subordinate officers in the executive department ought to hold at the pleasure of the head of that department, because he is invested generally with the executive authority, and every participation in that authority by the Senate was an exception to a general principle and ought to be taken strictly. The President is the great responsible officer for the faithful execution of the law, and the power of removal was incidental to that duty and might often be requisite to fulfill it. It may now be considered as firmly and definitely settled, and there is good sense and practical utility in the construction."

The Supreme Court of the United States in ex parte Hennen (13 Peters, page 259) says:

"It was very early adopted as the practical construction of the Constitution that the power of removal was vested in the President alone, and such would appear to have been the legislative construction of the Constitution. For in the organization of the three great Departments of State, War, and Treasury, in the year 1789, provision is made for the appointment of a subordinate officer by the head of the Department, who should have the charge and custody of the records, books, and papers appertaining to the office, when the head of the Department should be removed from the office by the President of the United States. (1 Story, 5, 31, 47.)

"When the Navy Department was established in the year 1798 (1 Story, 498), provision was made for the charge and custody of the books, records, and documents of the Department in case of vacancy in the office of Secretary by removal or otherwise. It is not here said by removal by the President, as is done with respect to the heads of the other Departments; and yet there can be no doubt that he holds his office by the same tenure as the other Secretaries, and is removable by the President. The change of phraseology arose, probably, from its having become the settled and well-understood construction of the Constitution that the power of removal was vested in the President alone in such cases, although the appointment of the officer was by the President and Senate."

Again, the Supreme Court of the United States in Blake's case (United States Reports, volume 103, page 232) quoted approvingly its antecedent decision in the following language:

"But it was very early adopted, as the practical construction of the Constitution, that this power was vested in the President alone. And such would appear to have been the legislative construction of the Constitution."

In Kilbourn vs. Thompson (103 United States Reports) the identical principles involved in the present conflict between the Senate and President are elaborately considered and decided.

Justice Miller, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

"It is believed to be one of the chief merits of the American system of written constitutional law that all the powers intrusted to Government, whether State or national, are divided into three grand departments, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial; that the functions appropriate to each of these branches of Government shall be vested in a separate body of public servants, and that the perfection of the system requires that the lines which separate and divide these departments shall be broadly and clearly defined. It is also essential to the successful working of this system that the persons intrusted with power in any one of these branches shall not be permitted to encroach upon the powers confided to the others, but that each shall by the law of its creation be limited to the exercise of the powers appropriate to its own department and no other.

"To these general propositions there are in the Constitution of the United States some important exceptions. One of these is that the President is so far made a part of the legislative power that his assent is required to the enactment of all statutes and resolutions of Congress. This, however, is so only to a limited extent, for a bill may become a law, notwithstanding the refusal of the President to approve it, by a vote of two-thirds of each House of Congress. So also the Senate is made a partaker in the functions of appointing officers and making treaties, which are supposed to be properly executive, by requiring its consent to the appointment of such officers and the ratification of treaties. The Senate also exercises the judicial power of trying impeachment and the House of preferring articles of impeachment.

"In the main, however, that instrument, the model on which are constructed the fundamental laws of the States, has blocked out with singular precision and in bold lines in its three primary articles the allotment of power to the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments of the Government. It also remains true as a general rule that the powers confided by the Constitution to one of these departments can not be exercised by another. It may be said that these are truisms which need no repetition here to give them force. But while the experience of almost a century has in general shown a wise and commendable forbearance in each of these branches from encroachments upon the others, it is not to be denied that such attempts have been made, and it is believed not always without success.

"The increase in the number of States, in their population and wealth, and in the amount of power, if not in its nature to be exercised by the Federal Government, presents powerful and growing temptation to those to whom that exercise is intrusted to overstep the just boundaries of their own department, and enter upon the domain of one of the others, or to assume powers not intrusted to either of them."

"The House of Representatives having the exclusive right to originate all bills for raising revenue, whether by taxation or otherwise, having with the Senate the right to declare war and fix the compensation of all officers and servants of the Government and vote the supplies which must pay that compensation, and being also the most numerous body of all those engaged in the exercise of the primary powers of the Government, is for these reasons least of all liable to encroachment upon its appropriate domain. By reason, also, of its popular origin, and the frequency with which the short term of office of its members requires the renewal of their authority at the hands of the people—the great source of all power in this country—encroachments by that body on the domain of co-ordinate branches of the Government would be received with less distrust than a similar exercise of unwarranted power by any other department of the Government. It is all the more necessary, therefore, that the exercise of power by this body, when acting separately from and independently of all other depositaries of power, should be watched with vigilance, and when called in question before any other tribunal having the right to pass upon it, that it should receive the most careful scrutiny.

"In looking to the preamble and resolution under which the committee acted, before which Kilbourn refused to testify, we are of opinion that the House of Representatives not only exceeded the limits of its own authority, but assumed a power which could only be properly exercised by another branch of the Government, because it was in its nature clearly judicial.

"The Constitution declares that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish. If what we have said of the division of the powers of the Government among the three departments be sound, this is equivalent to a declaration that no judicial power is vested in the Congress, or either branch of it, save in the cases specifically enumerated to which we have referred. If the investigation which the committee was directed to make was judicial in its character, and could only be properly and successfully made by a court of justice, and if it related to a matter wherein relief or redress could be had only by a judicial proceeding, we do not, after what has been said, deem it necessary to discuss the proposition that the power attempted to be exercised was one confided by the Constitution to the judicial and not to the legislative department of the Government. We think it equally clear that the power asserted is judicial and not legislative.

"If, indeed, any purpose had been avowed to impeach the Secretary, the whole aspect of the case would have been changed. But no such purpose is disclosed. None can be inferred from the preamble; and the characterization of the conduct of the Secretary by the term improvident and the absence of any words implying suspicion of criminality repel the idea of such purpose, for the Secretary could only be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors. How could the House of Representatives know until it had been fairly tried that the courts were powerless to redress the creditors of J. Cooke & Co.? The matter was still pending in a court, and what right had the Congress of the United States to interfere with a suit pending in a court of competent jurisdiction?

"Again, what inadequacy of power existed in the court or, as the preamble assumes, in all courts to give redress which could lawfully be supplied by an investigation by a committee of one House of Congress, or by any act or resolution of Congress on the subject? The case being one of a judicial nature, for which the power of the courts usually afford the only remedy, it may well be supposed that those powers were more appropriate and more efficient in aid of such relief than the powers which belong to a body whose function is exclusively legislative.

"If the settlement to which the preamble refers as the principal reason why the courts are rendered powerless was obtained by fraud or was without authority or for any conceivable reason could be set aside or avoided, it should be done by some appropriate proceeding in the court which had the whole matter before it and which had all the power in that case proper to be intrusted to any body, and not by Congress or by any power to be conferred on a committee of one of the two Houses.

"The resolution adopted as a sequence of this preamble contains no hint of any intention of final action by Congress on the subject. In all the argument of the case no suggestion has been made of what the House of Representatives or the Congress could have done in the way of remedying the wrong or securing the creditors of Jay Cooke & Co., or even the United States. Was it to be simply a fruitless investigation into the personal affairs of individuals? If so, the House of Representatives had no power or authority in the matter more than any other equal number of gentlemen interested for the Government of their country. By 'fruitless' we mean that it could result in no valid legislation on the subject to which the inquiry referred.

"The supreme court of Pennsylvania, in a well-considered case, reported in Pennsylvania State reports, volume 103, page 486, use the following language: 'In considering where the power of removal is lodged, we may draw some light from the interpretation given to the Constitution of the United States. It declares the President 'shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint' officers therein named. It is silent on the question of removal of any officer, but declares the judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold the offices during good behavior. As to other officers, Congress in 1789 affirmed the right of removal to exist in the President, without any co-operation of the Senate. That view was acquiesced in as the true construction of the Constitution until the passage by Congress of the tenure-of-office act of 2d of March, 1867, which was superseded by the act of 5th April, 1869, of a modified character. Apart from this legislation, the fact that the consent of the Senate was necessary to authorize the President to appoint did not prevent him from removing the officers at his pleasure."

Mr. Webster is paraded as an authority to support the present claim of the Senate. In the great debate on "executive patronage," in 1835, Mr. Webster spoke as follows:

"The bill before the Senate, it must be observed, expressly recognizes and admits the actual existence of the power of removal. I do not mean to deny, and the bill does not deny, that at the present moment the President may remove these officers at will, because the early decision adopted that construction and the laws have since uniformly sanctioned it. The law of 1820 expressly affirms the power. I consider it, therefore, a settled point; settled by construction; settled by precedent; settled by the practice of the Government, and settled by statute.

"At the same time I am very willing to say that, after considering the question again and again within the last six years, in my deliberate judgment the original decision was wrong. I can not but think that those who denied the power in 1789 had the best of the argument, and yet I will not say that I know myself so thoroughly as to affirm that this opinion may not have been produced in some measure by that abuse of the power which has been passing before our eyes for several years. It is possible that this experience of the evil may have affected my view of the constitutional argument."

Senator Thurman, in the protracted debate in 1869 on the bill to repeal the "tenure-of-office act," used the following language:

"Believing that the original interpretation of the Constitution is the correct one; that the power of removal from office is an executive power; that the duty of exercising that power is enjoined upon the President by the provision of the Constitution that he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed; believing that the assent of the Senate is not a necessary and logical result that the Senate consents to appointments; believing that no such inference follows from the concurrence of the Senate in making appointments; and believing also that it is wiser that it should be as our fathers settled it; that the offices will be better filled and the laws more faithfully executed if this power is vested in the President alone, I feel bound to vote for an unqualified repeal of the 'tenure-of-office act.'"

Senator Morton, in the same debate in 1869, spoke as follows:

"It was said by the Senator from Illinois that from the beginning men's minds have divided upon the question as to whether this power of removal existed in the Executive absolutely or in connection with the Senate. That the President might exercise it absolutely in the absence of legislation or restriction is confessed by the continued practice of the Government for seventy-eight years down to 1867.

"But the Senator says the minds of men were divided before that time on the question. Sir, that division did not amount to much. There have been very few questions raised in this country that there has not been something said on both sides within the last seventy or eighty years; but there has been as strong a union of opinion in favor of the exercise of this power by the Executive in the absence of legislation as can be found, perhaps, upon the exercise of any other power that is granted by the Constitution. Moreover, there has been a great unity of sentiment from the first that legislation upon that power was not desirable.

"My understanding of the tenure-of-office act is that it was adopted for a special purpose; that it was special in its character; that it was intended to meet a condition of things that had never occurred before in the administration and which we hope will never occur again. It was not made for all future Presidents. Sir, let me ask this question: If the tenure-of-office act had not been passed when it was, and was not now the law of the land, would it enter into the head of any Senator of any Member of Congress now to pass such a law? The enactment of the law was brought about by a peculiar state of public affairs.

"Senator SHERMAN in the same debate in 1869 used the following language: 'But now when we appeal to the Senate to yield to the President the same power of removal that has been exercised by Washington and every President from Washington down to Johnson, we are referred to old manuscripts that have never been printed before; we are referred to the debates of Webster and Clay and Calhoun, &c.

"'What is the secret of the whole of it? Why, sir, during Washington's administration the anti-Federalists were opposed to Washington and opposed to his appointing power; they opposed conferring upon Washington the power to remove the Secretary of State. After Washington's administration expired, and John Adams served his fitful four years with a majority much of the time in both Houses against him, where were those gentlemen then with their notions about the power of the President and the power of removal? In the time of Jefferson and Madison and Monroe where were those gentlemen who were afraid of executive authority? Did they propose to repeal any of the laws passed in the time of Washington? Not at all. In the time of John Quincy Adams Mr. Benton made a speech which has been read. Then John C. Calhoun, who had quarreled with Andrew Jackson, took up the banner of Benton, and made Benton's speech over again, and Mr. Webster and Mr. Clay joined in. If there was so much danger of this executive power why did not the Democratic party, with a large majority in both Houses, and with a President on their side, repeal these old laws which conferred upon the President the power of removal?

"'It always has been so, and it always will be so. Notwithstanding all that will be written and said, the ins will try to limit the power of the outs, and the outs will try to limit the power of the ins. There is no doubt about it. When the Democrats are in power, the Republicans seek to limit their power. When the Republicans are in power, the Democrats on the other hand seek to limit their power. So it has been in all times; and I do not think we are any wiser or better than our fathers, and probably no worse.'"

But the crowning indorsement of the settlement of this question by our fathers in 1789 and how it should now be regarded is contained in the great speech of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS], who always weighs well the full force and meaning of every word he utters. On the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson (one among other specifications being that he had without cause removed Secretary Stanton) Mr. EVARTS used the following language:

"The Congress of 1789 decided and its successors for three-quarters of a century acquiesced in that doctrine. I will not weary the Senate with a thorough analysis of the debate of 1789. It is, I believe, decidedly the most important debate in the history of Congress. It is, I think, the best-considered debate in the history of the Government. I think it included among its debaters as many of the able, wise, and learned men, the benefit of whose public service this nation has ever enjoyed, as any debate or measure which this Government has ever had or entertained. The premises in the Constitution were very narrow. The question of removal from office as a distinct subject had never occurred to the minds of the men of the convention. The tenure of office was not to be made permanent except in the case of judges of the Supreme Court. The periodicity of Congress, of the Senate, and of the Executive was fixed. Then there was an attribution of the whole interior administrative official powers of the Government to the Executive with the single qualification, exceptional in itself, that the advice and consent of the Senate should be required as a negative on the President's nomination only."

"If on these grounds you dismiss the President from this court convicted and deposed, you dismiss him the victim of the Congress and the martyr of the Constitution by the very terms of your judgment, and you throw open for the masters of us all in the great debates of an intelligent, instructed, fearless, practical nation of freemen division of sentiment to shake this country to its center—the omnipotence of Congress as the rallying cry on one side, and the supremacy of the Constitution on the other."

The minority of your committee beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to a few of the most conspicuous and illustrious protests against the wisdom of any attempt by the Senate to usurp the President's power of removal.

Senator Morton, in his speech on the bill to repeal the "tenure-of-office act," in 1869, spoke as follows:

"What is the effect when the Senate becomes a tribunal for the trial of the causes for which men are suspended? Scarcely any officer can be found of any importance who will not have some Senator upon this floor as his friend, and that Senator will stand up and inquire, 'What are the causes for which this man has been suspended? I have known him; he is my friend; perhaps I secured him the appointment, and I can not consent to his removal unless there is some tangible and sufficient cause made out.' Then the Senate must enter upon the investigation. They must examine into the causes of this man's suspension. Is he an honest officer? If not, what has he done? If he is an incapable officer, wherein has he failed? These are questions we must pass upon.

"Each one of these suspensions is a case. If we concur in the suspension after examination, the officer goes out of this Chamber with a blemish upon his character which he can scarcely outlive. If we refuse to concur in the suspension, we say to the world the President has done this man injustice, either intentionally or unintentionally. If he acted in good faith, he acted in ignorance; if he was well informed, then he acted in bad faith, or out of malicious feelings toward this man.

"The President is in some respects on trial also, and as he is to be put on trial as to whether his judgment has been intelligent, or has been an honest one in regard to the man suspended, he must feel a great deal of interest in the result, and if he is to be adjudged in this way he will hesitate a long time before he makes the suspension. He may be satisfied in his own mind that an officer is not doing right, but unless he can procure facts that are tangible in themselves, and that can be laid definitely before the Senate, or can be stated intelligently before a jury, he will not suspend that man, and the mal-administration goes on. Will you tell me, sir, that any administration can be conducted efficiently under the operation of that law?

"Now, Mr. President, let me suppose that this law remains in force, what will be the effect of it? When we come back here in the month of December we shall find a long docket of these cases of suspensions, perhaps several hundred of them, and they will have to be tried one by one. We take up the first case. That, perhaps, takes one afternoon, or one entire executive session. It may be two or three; and I tell you, sir, that this Senate will not have time, if it devotes its whole time to the consideration of these cases, to pass upon them if the President shall suspend every officer that, in his judgment, ought to be suspended for dishonesty or inefficiency. It will impose upon the Senate a labor that it can not perform. It will be physically impossible for it to discharge that labor.

"There must be responsibility somewhere. The very essence of successful administration under every constitutional Government is that the responsibility shall be distinctly located somewhere. Suppose he suspends an officer, and the Senate does not concur in that suspension, that part of the responsibility then belongs to the Senate. It is divided between some sixty or seventy gentlemen on this floor, and the share of each gentleman is very small. If the responsibility is placed between the President and Senate, neither of them will have the whole of it. We divide it up until it amounts to nothing."

Again we quote from the well-considered speech of Senator SHERMAN in the same debate:

"Has the Senator from Vermont arrived at that exemplary and forgiving state of mind that he would not be willing to remove any man who disagreed with him in opinion, or, in other words, who was a Democrat, unless he could be convicted of crime upon satisfactory evidence?"

Mr. EDMUNDS. Permit me to ask the Senator whether I ought not to have arrived at that virtuous point on true principles of government whether I have or not?

"Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think so. I believe that all the leading officers of this Government ought to be in harmony with the political sentiments of the majority, and that although the doctrine of Governor Marcy was rather too bluntly stated in his expression that 'to the victors belong the spoils,' yet in actual practice, in theory, and in fact, no administration of this Government ever did or ever will exist without practically acting upon the rule that to the successful party belong the great offices of the Government. It may not be according to the theoretical codes of morality and public policy which the Federalists talked of when the Democrats were in power and which the Democrats talked of when the Federalists were in power, but still it is a rule of practical administration which will always be applied in a republican form of government.

"Now, in my judgment, the tenure-of-office law can not with due regard to the public interests be practically enforced. What has been our experience within two years? When we came back here we were met with piles of documents which the President sent to us; various papers showing that certain officers of the Government had performed acts which in his judgment amounted to misdemeanor, &c., and for which they were suspended. He gave us specific facts and evidence.

"These cases were referred to the appropriate committees. What were we called upon to examine? We had to take up and carefully read piles of papers and examine each particular case, like a chancellor or a judge of assize. Every suspended officer contended that he was the most innocent man born since the time of Adam. He demanded a trial and copies of charges and proof and a formal hearing before the committees of this body, he converting us into a court and jury to try his particular case. If we could not try him, why demand charges and evidence?

"If the tenure-of-office act was right in principle we were bound to examine each case to see whether or not the accused officer was, according to the language of the law, guilty of misconduct in office or crime or had become incapable or legally disqualified. 'The result was that some of the committees of this body could not transact their business. These cases were referred and after great delay were reported upon. In one case the accused was tried, convicted, and sent to the penitentiary while we were deliberating whether he was properly suspended or not.' The result was that we did not and could not determine them.

"There probably will be from five hundred to five thousand removals during the next year in the service of the United States in the ordinary course of the business of this country. The number of offices to whose appointment the confirmation of this body is required I should estimate in round numbers at from five to twenty thousand. We know there are great multitudes of them whose appointments require the confirmation of the Senate. If we have to remain here and act upon the cases of all removals in order to evade the second section, we put ourselves to a great deal of unnecessary trouble merely to evade one of our own laws. If we adjourn and leave the President without any power to remove and only the power of suspension, his hands are effectually tied. He can not suspend a postmaster, or a revenue officer, or any of this vast multitude of officers, unless he is prepared upon satisfactory evidence to make out a case of crime or misconduct in office.

"It is practically impossible thus to administer the Government. The practical effect of the tenure-of-office act is to keep bad men in office, to divide the responsibility for their misconduct, to enable the President to shield himself from responsibility, and to destroy the energy, efficiency, and unity absolutely necessary in the executive administration of various departments of the Government. That was the practical effect.

"Now, Mr. President, look at the actual result as we know it existed. It was the common practice for applicants for office to run here to members of the Senate and say: 'I can get an appointment if I am sure of confirmation.' There was not a member of the Senate who was not pressed constantly by his constituents to pass his judgment in advance on the question of confirmation and before his appointment. 'I can get the appointment if I am sure of confirmation,' which reversed the whole order of proceeding in filling the offices of the Government. The Senate became the appointing power. That was the course of business. The result was that many men who had an acute sense of honor, who wished to be free from all this kind of double complication, would not seek or accept office under an administration so hampered and controlled.

"The duty of the Senate is to advise and consent to appointments. The Constitution confers on this body no power to remove. We consent to removals; we advise as to confirmations. When a man is removed from office and another name is sent here we pass simply upon his qualifications and fitness for the office; but the Constitution confers upon us no power to proceed in the removal. That is conferred only by the tenure-of-office act. Nowhere else do we derive such a power. By the tenure-of-office act the power of removal as well as the power of confirmation is conferred on the Senate; and I say with such a power invested in the Senate it will be impossible to avoid controversy and collision between the executive power and the Senate. We shall share in and finally monopolize the power of the Executive over all the offices of the Government.

"Senators must very easily draw distinction between the power of removal and the power of confirmation. The power of confirmation is a resulting power, depending on the previous act of another officer of the Government; and all we say in our act of confirmation is whether or not the person named is a man fit to discharge the duties of the office. That power can not and will not be abused; but the power of removal is a very different power, a power never contemplated to be invested in the Senate.

"It seems to me that we are now acting as judges in our own case. If this great power of the Senate is maintained to prevent the removal of any officer of this Government it is maintained by the Senate for its own behalf. The public judgment will say that, although we are not nominally interested, we are maintaining powers that were never conferred upon the Senate until two years ago, and which were then conferred for a special purpose. In my opinion we ought to be careful that our judgment should be impartial, and not to be influenced by a love of power.

"We share in one-half of the legislative authority of this Government. We are judges over all officers in the trial of impeachment. We participate with the Executive in the power of appointing to office, also in the power to make treaties. I ask if all these great powers are not sufficient for the ambition of any Senate.

* * * * * * * *

"As a general rule it is not wise to mingle the powers of the various departments of the Government. There are three great divisions or departments of the Government that stand apart from each other. They form the triangle of public safety, and upon them rest the safety, order, and good conduct of society. These are the legislative, the executive, and the judicial departments. They have been in exceptional cases mingled. The Senate shares with the President in the appointing power, and also shares with the President in the treaty-making power, &c. It is not wise in my judgment to overlook this division of powers."

The foregoing overwhelming array of authorities, reasons, and arguments demonstrate conclusively the far-seeing wisdom and statesmanship of the settlement of the great question now before the Senate by our fathers in 1789. No one had the temerity to disturb it until 1814, during the administration of Mr. Madison.

In the debate in 1835, found in Congressional Debates, volume 11, part 1, page 530, Senator Grundy said: "When Mr. Granger, in 1814, was dismissed from the office of Postmaster-General by Mr. Madison a great sensation was produced both in and out of Congress. This I know, for I was here at that period. Mr. Granger was known to be an able and efficient officer. He was a great favorite with the Democracy of New England. He was not dismissed for any delinquency in the discharge of his public duties. In this state of things the following resolution was introduced into the Senate of the United States, as appears from the second volume Executive Journal, page 504. Mr. German submitted the following motion for consideration:

"'Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to inform the Senate whether the office of Postmaster-General be now vacant, and if vacant, in what manner the same became vacant.'

"This resolution was rejected by a vote of the Senate, which shows it was the understanding at that time that they had no right to interfere in cases of removal."

This is the only instance, since the decision of the Congress in 1789, in which any member of the Senate has attempted to call on the President for his reasons for removal, until the present Chief Magistrate came into office. In 1830, Mr. Holmes, then a Senator from Maine, introduced a series of resolutions, one of which called for the President's reasons for removals from office, as follows:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to communicate to the Senate the number, names, and offices of the officers removed by him since the last session of the Senate, with the reasons for each removal.

"On motion by Mr. Grundy that said motion be postponed indefinitely, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 24, nays 21."

The tenure-of-office law, passed in 1867, was the first and only legislative interference by the Senate with the President's power of removal; and the objects and exceptional reasons of that act of usurpation have been fully explained by those who aided in its passage. President Grant, in his first annual message, in 1869, recommended the total repeal of the tenure-of-office law, for the reason that it would be impossible for him to administer the Government under its operation. The House, by nearly a unanimous vote, recommended the repeal.

The House bill was amended in the Senate as now found in sections 1767 and 1768. Section 1767 is part of the original act, with the material qualification that it is subjected to the control of section 1768. Section 1768 is the controlling part of the whole act as it now exists. That section provides that—

"During any recess of the Senate the President is authorized, in his discretion, to suspend any civil officer appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, * * * until the end of the next session of the Senate, and to designate some suitable person, subject to be removed, in his discretion, by the designation of another, to perform the duties of such suspended officer in the mean time; and the person so designated shall take the oath and give the bond required by law to be taken and given by the suspended officer, and shall, during the time he performs the duties of such officer, be entitled to the salary and emoluments of the office, no part of which shall belong to the officer suspended. The President shall, within thirty days after the commencement of each session of the Senate, except for any office which in his opinion ought not to be filled, nominate persons to fill all vacancies in office which existed at the meeting of the Senate, whether temporarily filled or not, and also in the place of all officers suspended; and if the Senate during such session shall refuse to advise and consent to an appointment in the place of any suspended officer, then, and not otherwise, the President shall nominate another person as soon as practicable to the same session of the Senate for the office."

It must be conceded, as this section expressly provides, that the President's power to suspend a civil officer in vacations of the Senate is "discretionary," and that such suspended officer remains out of the office at least until the Senate adjourns, when he is again certainly liable to be suspended if reinstated by the operation of section 1768, which is denied by many of the best lawyers in the Senate, and so on without limitation as to time or discretion should the President elect to exercise his power of suspension. On this discretionary power of the President to suspend, as called in the statute, or to remove from office under the Constitution, the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Marbury vs. Madison, 1 Cranch's Reports, at page 165, says:

"By the Constitution of the United States the President is invested with certain important political powers, in the exercise of which he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character and to his own conscience. To aid him in the performance of these duties he is authorized to appoint certain officers, who act by his authority and in conformity with his orders.

"In such cases their acts are his acts, and whatever opinion may be entertained of the manner in which executive discretion may be used, still there exists and can exist no power to control that discretion. The subjects are political. They respect the nation, not individual rights, and being intrusted to the Executive, the decision of the Executive is conclusive."

In relation to the exercise by the President of his power of suspension or removal for cause, the distinguished Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] in the debate on the bill to repeal the tenure-of-office act, used the following language in answer to Senator Morton:

"I say with him that the President of the United States has no business to nominate to us a man—I am now speaking of moral business, because the Constitution gives him a right to nominate as often as he pleases—the President has no right to propose to us to put out one man and put in another unless there is cause. Now, what is cause? The Constitution has made the cause. The united discretion of the President of the United States and the representatives of the States; that is cause. If the President of the United States thinks for any reason that satisfies his moral nature that it is better to make a change in an office, and proposes it to us, and we are satisfied for any reason that is consonant to our moral sense of right and wrong that that change ought to or may be made, then it is done and there is cause. My friend may go into a dissertation if he wishes to do so when it comes to his turn to speak upon proximate and final cause. There is ever so much discussion in books of philosophy about that.

"But it is cause enough for me, sir, constitutional cause, if the Senator will, when the President of the United States acting, if he is honest as he always must, upon a conscientious regard for the public service and a conscientious sense of his responsibility to the people and to God, chooses to send in one man's name for a place that another man holds. When he has done that he has done his duty, whether that cause satisfies my friend and me or not. Then it becomes our opportunity to speak and to consider, and if we are satisfied with the cause, or with any other cause that appeals to our judgment and good sense, the act is accomplished."

We have in this extract the key to the report of the majority of your committee.

The Senator from Vermont, the able chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is entitled to the distinction of being the author of the remarkable discovery that the unqualified, exclusive, and independent power of removing or suspending officers of the United States can be conceded to the President for his free exercise for any cause or reason that may satisfy him, and that the Senate has no right to interfere with or control in any manner the use of such power by the President; but that after the President has so exercised his power and made the suspension for any cause satisfactory to him, and nominates to the Senate a person to take the place of the suspended officer, then the power of the Senate intervenes to "advise and consent to th' nomination," which is just as absolute, exclusive, and independent as the President's power to suspend and nominate, and that in the exercise of this power the Senate can decide with or without cause, or for any cause satisfactory to them, to withhold their advice and consent to the nomination.

The soundness of this proposition may be admitted, as the Senate can arbitrarily exercise any discretionary power; but it leaves the question unanswered whether the Senate has any constitutional or lawful right to request the President or direct the Attorney-General to transmit to the Senate in executive session papers and documents, in the keeping of either, that relate exclusively to suspensions by the President under section 1768 of the tenure-of-office act. Such papers and documents have no existence or character as public documents. They relate solely to a matter under the absolute power and control of the President, "in the exercise of which," in the language of the Supreme Court, "he is to use his own discretion, and is accountable only to his country in his political character and to his own conscience."

The right of the Senate or House to papers and documents in the keeping of the President or the heads of Departments must be decided by their contents and character and the use that can be made of them in the exercise of any power or jurisdiction intrusted to either House by the Constitution in executive or legislative session. If the papers and documents can instruct or aid either House in the exercise of legislative or executive powers or privileges intrusted to them by the Constitution, the right of either House to the possession of such papers or documents or their contents has never been questioned. It is impossible, in the judgment of the minority, for the majority or for the Senate to find the slightest support, excuse, or justification for their claim to the papers and documents relating exclusively to suspensions by the President, except on the ground that the Senate has the same power under the Constitution of advising and consenting to suspensions by the President that they have to advise and consent to his appointments.

There is no ingenuity sufficiently skilled in special pleading to separate the two powers of suspension and appointment, and make each absolute and independent of the other, and at the same time claim that the custodian of one power is entitled to all the papers and documents in the sole keeping of the custodian of the other power and relating exclusively to matters within his jurisdiction.

But it is insisted that the President has no right to know or to inquire what use the Senate intends making of the papers and documents. Can it be seriously urged that if the papers and documents called for are not public, but private, and relate exclusively to the official acts of the President, for which he is under no responsibility to the Senate, that the Senate has any right to their possession? Who is to judge whether the papers and documents are public or private—the President, who knows their contents and to what they relate, or the Senate, who has no such information? How is the Senate to pass on the character and contents of the papers and documents before seeing them, and how will it be if after inspection of the papers and documents the Senate decides it has no right to their possession? How can the President possibly avoid knowing what use the Senate intends making of the papers when they show on their face that they can not be made to relate to anything but suspension? And if it were possible for the President to close his eyes to the contents of the papers and documents and the use that is to be made of them by the Senate, can the right be denied to those Senators who resist the claim of the Senate to have inspection of papers and documents relating exclusively to suspensions by the President to know what use is intended to be made of the papers and documents by the Senate?

The minority claim to know what use is intended to be made by the majority of your committee of the papers and documents called for and relating exclusively to suspensions, and with that knowledge the minority are satisfied that their possession and use by the Senate is unconstitutional and supported by no law, usage, or public policy, and that their transmission to the Senate was rightfully refused by the Attorney-General on the order of the President. The minority of your committee can not close their report without expressing surprise at the appearance in the majority report of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the provision of section 1754 of the Revised Statutes declaring 'That persons honorably discharged from the military or naval service by reason of disability resulting from wounds or sickness incurred in the line of duty shall be preferred for appointments to civil offices, provided they are found to possess the business capacity necessary for the proper discharge of the duties of such office' ought to be faithfully and fully put in execution, and that to remove, or to propose to remove, any such soldier whose faithfulness, competency, and character are above reproach and to give place to another who has not rendered such service is a violation of the spirit of the law, and of the practical gratitude the people and Government of the United States owe to the defenders of constitutional liberty and the integrity of the Government."

Under what action of the Senate does the majority claim the authority to report such a resolution to the Senate for its adoption? What possible connection has the subject mentioned in the resolution with the papers and documents called for in the case of the suspension of Duskin, which is the only matter referred by the Senate to the Judiciary Committee? The information of the minority of your committee is that Duskin never was a Union soldier, but, on the contrary, was either a member of the confederate army or a confederate sympathizer in his native State of North Carolina.

The minority of your committee fully indorse section 1754 of the Revised Statutes, and heartily favor its faithful execution; but their information and belief satisfy them that under its operation during the administrations of Republican Presidents partisan and political influences and considerations have governed in a great degree in the selection of the intended beneficiaries of that statute, so that no equal and just distribution has been made by Republican Presidents among the meritorious class described in the law, as is doubtless desired alike by Republican and Democratic soldiers and marines, who were comrades in a common cause.

Such unauthorized action of the majority of your committee serves one purpose, and that is to furnish additional proof of what was before manifest, that the object and intent of this extraordinary proceeding is to secure political and partisan advantage and benefit. The inevitable result is to arraign President Cleveland and try him by the Senate, with an unfriendly political majority, for making suspensions in alleged violation of his public pledges and promises not to make removals or suspensions except for cause.

President Cleveland's promises and pledges are part of the published history of the country, and for their faithful performance he denies his responsibility to the Senate, and stands ready for trial by the people. He did make the promise that during the term of a civil officer he would not suspend or remove him for the sole reason that he was a Republican. Merely being a Republican, if he had been and was a capable, faithful, and efficient officer, the President declared he would not regard as sufficient cause. But if such officer while in office had used its power or influence or emoluments to promote the organization and success of his party, by attending county, district, State, or national conventions and making himself active as a partisan in elections, the President has publicly declared such conduct and action by any incumbent, however capable, faithful, and efficient in the discharge of his official duties, as a violation of the spirit of the law declaring that civil office is a public trust for public uses, and not to be employed as an element of power in party organizations and elections, and that such conduct would be treated as sufficient cause for suspensions.

The President declines to submit voluntarily to the decision of a tribunal having no jurisdiction over the question, the sufficiency of such cause for suspensions especially, when his fear is that such conduct in the officer might be regarded by the Republican majority as a reason for the retention of the incumbent in office. The President will never avoid a trial by the people for the exercise of any of his powers, or the discharge of any of his official duties, as he will have a fair tribunal on the whole truth. But he declines obedience to any unlawful summons to trial under usurped authority by an unfriendly tribunal on mere papers and documents relating exclusively to suspensions, and containing in nearly every case only a partial statement of the causes, facts, and reasons for his official act of suspension. In a large majority of the cases of suspension, as the minority are informed, the President had information communicated to him orally by persons considered reliable, which it would be impossible for him to remember or reproduce in every case so as to put the Senate in possession of all the facts which governed him in the suspension, if the Senate had the authority under the Constitution or laws of the United States to call him to an account.

In conclusion, the minority of your committee are gratified at being able to state that in the Forty-sixth Congress, when the Democrats had a majority in the Senate, no such spectacle as that now exhibited to the country was ever witnessed in the history of its proceedings.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

RECORD FOR LEGATIONS ABROAD.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back without amendment the joint resolution (S. R. 47) to forward a copy of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to each of our legations abroad. The passage of this joint resolution is desired by the State Department, and it has also received the indorsement of the Committee on Foreign Relations. I ask that it be now considered.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. INGALLS. Does this joint resolution require the signature of the President of the United States before it becomes effective?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does.

Mr. INGALLS. I move, then, to change it to the form of a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves that the joint resolution be changed to the form of a bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that amendment will be agreed to.

The joint resolution was accordingly changed to a bill (S. 1653) to forward a copy of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to each of our legations abroad; and it was read twice by its title.

Mr. ALLISON. Does the bill provide for the method by which these copies of the RECORD shall be sent?

Mr. LOGAN. It provides for sending them through the State Department.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Public Printer be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to forward, free of charge, through the Department of State, one copy of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to each of our legations abroad, commencing at the beginning of the present session.

Mr. ALLISON. That would require an appropriation if it is to be done through the Public Printer. Of course that means that these copies of the RECORD shall be sent postage prepaid.

Mr. MANDERSON. I will state, in answer to the inquiry of the Senator from Iowa, that for a number of years the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was sent to our legations abroad, and, as suggested in the letter of the Secretary of State, which I shall ask to have read for the information of the Senate, by the terms of the limitation of the act providing for its distribution the distribution ceased in 1881. The proposition is that the Public Printer shall furnish to the Secretary of State the necessary numbers daily for this use, and they are to be sent abroad by the State Department.

Mr. ALLISON. But the criticism I make upon the present language is that the duty of sending them abroad is imposed upon the Public Printer.

Mr. MANDERSON. Not as I understand it.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I ask that that provision may be again read.

Mr. MANDERSON. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of State be also read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. That means free of charge to the Printer?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The letter of the Secretary of State will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, February 16, 1886.

SIR: On the 18th day of December, 1880, Congress passed a joint resolution directing the Public Printer to forward free of charge one copy of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to each of our legations abroad. This joint resolution expired by limitation on the 4th day of March, 1881.

Our ministers abroad have since in many instances made application to this Department to be supplied with this publication, but it has not been thought proper to incur the expense of sending it in absence of Congressional authorization.

It is very obvious that if the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD were sent to our legations, it would very materially aid our ministers abroad in the discharge of their public duties by informing them fully and promptly as to the current proceedings of Congress, a subject in regard to which they are frequently called upon for information both by the officers of the countries to which they are respectively accredited and by our own citizens engaged in business in foreign countries. I would therefore respectfully recommend the adoption of a joint resolution authorizing and directing the Public Printer to forward, free of charge, through the Department of State, one copy of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to each of our legations abroad, commencing with the beginning of the present session.

Inclosing for your consideration a draft of a joint resolution in relation to the subject, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

T. F. BAYARD.

Hon. JOHN F. MILLER,
Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Does that mean that the Public Printer is to furnish these copies of the daily RECORD to the Secretary of State in sufficient number to enable him to send them to the legations, or that they are to be sent from the Public Printer's office direct? And does that "free of charge" mean free of charge for printing or free of postage? It is left in doubt. I understand that the State Department forwards its dispatches and mail direct to the legations in a daily or weekly dispatch bag, or else to some central dispatch agent, from which they are distributed over the continent; and I should suppose that the bill ought to be, of course, specific as to the method, in order that the Public Printer may determine whether he is to send a sufficient number of these copies to the Secretary of State, and whether his functions end there.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The occupant of the chair happens to know that the phrase "free of charge" means in this case that instead of being charged to the State Department, as such things sometimes are, they are not to be charged to the State Department and taken out of its contingent fund.

Mr. INGALLS. That ought to be so stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is in the precise form in which it came from the State Department. It is still open to amendment. Does the Senator from Kansas propose an amendment?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no amendment as in Committee of the Whole the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. As amended. An amendment has been made changing the form.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, let us hear the title read.

The CHIEF CLERK. A bill to forward a copy of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to each of our legations abroad.

Mr. INGALLS. That does not express the purpose of the bill. The bill is to forward the copies to the Secretary of State for that purpose, and if the bill is to have its title consistent it ought to be amended. I have no suggestion to make further than that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The title will stand as reported unless an amendment is offered to it.

REMOVALS AND SUSPENSIONS FROM OFFICE.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom were referred a resolution offered by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. RIDDLEBERGER] in relation to the removal and suspension of Federal officers, &c., and an amendment to the resolution proposed as a substitute by the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PUGH], to report the same without recommendation and move that they lie upon the table.

The committee found that the same subject had been dealt with by another committee of the Senate, who have now made a majority and a minority report, and they did not think it worth while to take the trouble to undertake to formulate a resolution which would express the opinion of the committee, or a majority of it, on this very important question, believing that the Senate would probably dispose of the whole subject in some way under the resolution reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. We therefore report back the resolution without recommendation, and I move that the resolution and the substitute lie on the table. They can then be called up by either Senator interested, if either shall desire to call them up, at any time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order to lay on the table will be made, if there be no objection.

EULOGIES ON VICE-PRESIDENT HENDRICKS.

Mr. GORMAN. From the Committee on Printing I report back the joint resolution (H. Res. 124) to print 31,000 copies of the eulogies on Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GORMAN, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1478) to authorize the printing of the eulogies delivered in Congress upon the late Thomas A. Hendricks, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

EULOGIES ON REPRESENTATIVE ELLWOOD.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the joint resolution (H. Res. 105) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Reuben Ellwood, late a Representative in Congress, with a recommendation that it do pass, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 61) for the relief of Benjamin M. Simpson;

A bill (H. R. 79) for the relief of Pryor N. Lea;

A bill (H. R. 274) for the relief of John A. Morris;

Mr. BOWEN introduced a bill (S. 1715) to regulate the transportation of live stock; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 1716) for the relief of Frederick Foote, of Fairfax County, Virginia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MANDERSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1717) for the relief of Robert H. Montgomery, captain Fifth Cavalry, United States Army; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LOGAN introduced a bill (S. 1718) authorizing the Chicago, Saint Louis and New Orleans Railroad Company, and the Illinois Central Railroad Company, or either of them, to construct a bridge over the Ohio River at or near Cairo, Ill.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1719) recognizing Elias J. Beymer as an enrolling officer; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HARRISON introduced a bill (S. 1720) granting a pension to John Thrasher; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 1721) for the relief of the heirs and legal representatives of Matthew Allison, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO INTERSTATE-COMMERCE BILL.

Mr. PLUMB. I present an amendment to the bill (S. 1532) to regulate commerce, as reported by the Select Committee on Interstate Commerce, which I desire shall be printed and laid on the table. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to amend Senate bill 1532 by adding:

SEC. —. That it shall not be lawful for any railroad company or for any manager, officer, or employé of any such company to issue or deliver to any member of Congress, or to any officer or employé of the Government, or to any person at the request or on behalf of such member of Congress or employé, or to any member of the family of such member of Congress or officer or employé, any pass, check, or other instrument entitling the person to whom issued or any other person whomsoever to ride over any such railroad, or any part thereof, free or for a rate or charge less than that required to be paid by the general public. And it shall likewise be unlawful for any member of Congress or for any officer or employé of the Government to apply for or receive for himself or for another, or to use any such pass, check, or other instrument, or in any way to travel over any such railroad or any part thereof at and for any rate or charge lower than that charged to the general public; and any person who violates any of the foregoing provisions shall be subject to imprisonment not exceeding six months, or a fine of not less than $500 or both, such imprisonment and fine, in the discretion of the court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

BASIS OF BANK CIRCULATION.

Mr. BOWEN. I submit an amendment to the bill (S. 1594) providing for a new basis for the circulation of national banks, and for other purposes, which I ask may be printed and laid on the table. The bill is now upon the table, and I wish to say that on Wednesday morning of this week, at the expiration of the morning hour, or at such time as shall meet the convenience of the Senate, I propose to address the Senate upon the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. BLACKBURN, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the improvement and enlargement of the barracks at Newport, Ky., be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. MAHONE, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Arthur Connell be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Ordered, That the papers on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate relating to the claim of Frederick Foote be withdrawn and placed with the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. JONES, of Arkansas, it was Ordered, That the papers relating to the claim for pension of Gibson Morrison be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Ordered, That the papers in the claim of Samuel K. Stone and Isaac H. Marks be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. MANDERSON, it was Ordered, That the papers on file in the Secretary's office pertaining to Senate bill No. 1978, second session Forty-sixth Congress, for the relief of C. N. Emery, be withdrawn from the files.

HOUSE PENSION BILLS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 424) to pension Giles C. Hawley;
A bill (H. R. 443) granting a pension to Susan Woolley;
A bill (H. R. 464) granting a pension to Robert McAlexander;

A bill (H. R. 4976) for the relief of Tobias M. Coon; and A bill (H. R. 5127) granting a pension to Mary A. Ripley.

The foregoing thirty-five pension bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred as indicated below:

The bill (H. R. 61) for the relief of Benjamin M. Simpson—to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill (H. R. 79) for the relief of Pryor N. Lea—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 274) for the relief of John A. Morris—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. 1245) to authorize the increase of the capital stock of the First National Bank of Shakopee, Minn.—to the Committee on Finance.

The bill (H. R. 1464) for the relief of David Webster—to the Committee on Claims.

The bill (H. R. 2463) for the relief of H. J. T. Moss—to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The bill (H. R. 4413) for the relief of the legal representatives of William Clift, deceased—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill (H. R. 1151) authorizing the President of the United States to appoint Lieut. William P. Randall a lieutenant-commander on the retired-list of the Navy was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DAWES. That same bill is upon the Calendar, reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs. I suppose it would be proper for the bill to lie on the table, so that it may be substituted for the other bill, if the Senate shall so desire.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. Following the suggestion made on Friday in a colloquy between the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECK] and myself, I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Maine withdraw his motion?

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator from Maine has said to me privately that he makes the motion at this time in the hope that the executive session may be brief and possibly concluded before the hour of 2 o'clock, when the unfinished business in legislative session will be in order. In that hope and with the understanding that should the executive session be prolonged beyond that hour the unfinished business will retain its position on the Calendar, I do not wish to make any opposition to the motion to go into executive session at this time.

Mr. HALE. I renew the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and eighteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RELATIONS OF SENATE WITH EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENTS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GRAY in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

Ever since the beginning of the present session of the Senate the different heads of the Departments attached to the executive branch of the Government have been plied with various requests and demands from committees of the Senate, from members of such committees, and at last from the Senate itself, requiring the transmission of reasons for the suspension of certain officials during the recess of that body, or for the papers touching the conduct of such officials, or for all papers and documents relating to such suspensions, or for all documents and papers filed in such Departments in relation to the management and conduct of the offices held by such suspended officials.

The different terms from time to time adopted in making these requests and demands, the order in which they succeeded each other, and the fact that when made by the Senate the resolution for that purpose was passed in executive session, have led to a presumption, the correctness of which will, I suppose, be candidly admitted, that from first to last the information thus sought and the papers thus demanded were desired for use by the Senate and its committees in considering the propriety of the suspensions referred to.

Though these suspensions are my executive acts, based upon considerations addressed to me alone, and for which I am wholly responsible, I have had no invitation from the Senate to state the position which I have felt constrained to assume in relation to the same, or to interpret for myself my acts and motives in the premises.

In this condition of affairs I have forborne addressing the Senate upon the subject, lest I might be accused of thrusting myself unbidden upon the attention of that body.

But the report of the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate, lately presented and published, which censures the Attorney-General of the United States for his refusal to transmit certain papers relating to a suspension from office, and which also, if I correctly interpret it, evinces a misapprehension of the position of the Executive upon the question of such suspensions, will, I hope, justify this communication.

This report is predicated upon a resolution of the Senate directed to the Attorney-General and his reply to the same. This resolution was adopted in executive session, devoted entirely to business connected with the consideration of nominations for office. It required the Attorney-General "to transmit to the Senate copies of all documents and papers that have been filed in the Department of Justice since the 1st day of January, 1885, in relation to the management and conduct of the office of district attorney of the United States of the southern district of Alabama."

The incumbent of this office on the 1st day of January, 1885, and until the 17th day of July ensuing, was George M. Duskin, who, on the day last mentioned, was suspended by an executive order, and John D. Burnett designated to perform the duties of said office. At the time of the passage of the resolution above referred to the nomination of Burnett for said office was pending before the Senate, and all the papers relating to said nomination were before that body for its inspection and information.

In reply to this resolution, the Attorney-General, after referring to the fact that the papers relating to the nomination of Burnett had already been sent to the Senate, stated that he was directed by the President to say that "the papers and documents which are mentioned in said resolution and still remaining in the custody of this Department, having exclusive reference to the suspension by the President of George M. Duskin, the late incumbent of the office of district attorney for the southern district of Alabama, it is not considered that the public interests will be promoted by a compliance with said resolution and the transmission of the papers and documents therein mentioned to the Senate in executive session.

Upon this resolution and the answer thereto the issue is thus stated by the Committee on the Judiciary at the outset of the report:

"The important question, then, is whether it is within the constitutional competence of either House of Congress to have access to the official papers and documents in the various public offices of the United States created by laws enacted by themselves."

I do not suppose that "the public offices of the United States" are regulated or controlled in their relations to either House of Congress by the fact that they were "created by laws enacted by themselves." It must be that these instrumentalities were created for the benefit of the people and to answer the general purposes of government under the Constitution and the laws, and that they are unencumbered by any lien in favor of either branch of Congress growing out of their construction, and unembarrassed by any obligation to the Senate as the price of their creation.

The complaint of the committee, that access to official papers in the public offices is denied the Senate, is met by the statement that at no time has it been the disposition or the intention of the President or any Department of the executive branch of the Government to withhold from the Senate official documents or papers filed in any of the public offices. While it is by no means conceded that the Senate has the right in any case to review the act of the Executive in removing or suspending a public officer upon official documents or otherwise, it is considered that documents and papers of that nature should, because they are official, be freely transmitted to the Senate upon its demand, trusting the use of the same for proper and legitimate purposes to the good faith of that body. And though no such paper or document has been specifically demanded in any of the numerous requests and demands made upon the Departments, yet as often as they were found in the public offices they have been furnished in answer to such applications.

The letter of the Attorney-General in response to the resolution of the Senate in the particular case mentioned in the committee's report was written at my suggestion and by my direction. There had been no official papers or documents filed in his Department relating to the case within the period specified in the resolution. The letter was intended, by its description of the papers and documents remaining in the custody of the Department, to convey the idea that they were not official; and it was assumed that the resolution called for information, papers, and documents of the same character as were required by the requests and demands which preceded it.

Everything that had been written or done on behalf of the Senate from the beginning pointed to all letters and papers of a private and unofficial nature as the objects of search, if they were to be found in the Departments, and provided they had been presented to the Executive with a view to their consideration upon the question of suspension from office.

Against the transmission of such papers and documents I have interposed my advice and direction. This has not been done, as is suggested in the committee's report, upon the assumption on my part that the Attorney-General or any other head of a Department "is the servant of the President, and is to give or withhold copies of documents in his office according to the will of the Executive and not otherwise," but because I regard the papers and documents withheld and addressed to me, or intended for my use and action, purely unofficial and private, not infrequently confidential, and having reference to the performance of a duty exclusively mine. I consider them in no proper sense as upon the files of the Department, but as deposited there for my convenience, remaining still completely under my control. I suppose if I desired to take them into my custody I might do so with entire propriety, and if I saw fit to destroy them no one could complain.

Even the committee in its report appears to concede that there may be with the President, or in the Departments, papers and documents which, on account of their unofficial character, are not subject to the inspection of the Congress. A reference in the report to instances where the House of Representatives ought not to succeed in a call for the production of papers is immediately followed by this statement:

"The committee feels authorized to state, after a somewhat careful research, that within the foregoing limits there is scarcely in the history of this Government, until now, any instance of a refusal by a head of a Department, or even of the President himself, to communicate official facts and information as distinguished from private and unofficial papers, motions, views, reasons, and opinions to either House of Congress when unconditionally demanded."

To which of the classes thus recognized do the papers and documents belong that are now the objects of the Senate's quest?

They consist of letters and representations addressed to the Executive or intended for his inspection; they are voluntarily written and presented by private citizens who are not in the least instigated thereto by any official invitation or at all subject to official control. While some of them are entitled to executive consideration, many of them are so irrelevant, or in the light of other facts so worthless that they have not been given the least weight in determining the question to which they are supposed to relate.

Are all these, simply because they are preserved, to be considered official documents and subject to the inspection of the Senate? If not, who is to determine which belong to this class? Are the motives and purposes of the Senate, as they are day by day developed, such as would be satisfied with my selection? Am I to submit to theirs at the risk of being charged with making a suspension from office upon evidence which was not even considered?

Are these papers to be regarded official because they have not only been presented but preserved in the public offices?

Their nature and character remain the same whether they are kept in the Executive Mansion or deposited in the Departments. There is no mysterious power of transmutation in departmental custody, nor is there magic in the undefined and sacred solemnity of Department files. If the presence of these papers in the public offices is a stumbling-block in the way of the performance of Senatorial duty, it can be easily removed.

The papers and documents which have been described derive no official character from any constitutional, statutory, or other requirement making them necessary to the performance of the official duty of the Executive.

It will not be denied, I suppose, that the President may suspend a public officer in the entire absence of any papers or documents to aid his official judgment and discretion. And I am quite prepared to avow that the cases are not few in which suspensions from office have depended more upon oral representations made to me by citizens of known good repute, and by members of the House of Representatives and Senators of the United States, than upon any letters and documents presented for my examination. I have not felt justified in suspecting the veracity, integrity, and patriotism of Senators, or ignoring their representations, because they were not in party affiliation with the majority of their associates; and I recall a few suspensions which bear the approval of individual members identified politically with the majority in the Senate.

While, therefore, I am constrained to deny the right of the Senate to the papers and documents described, so far as the right to the same is based upon the claim that they are in any view of the subject official, I am also led unequivocally to dispute the right of the Senate, by the aid of any documents whatever, or in any way save through the judicial process of trial on impeachment, to review or reverse the acts of the Executive in the suspension, during the recess of the Senate, of Federal officials.

I believe the power to remove or suspend such officials is vested in the President alone by the Constitution, which in express terms provides that "the executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America," and that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

The Senate belongs to the legislative branch of the Government. When the Constitution by express provision superadded to its legislative duties the right to advise and consent to appointments to office and to sit as a court of impeachment, it conferred upon that body all the control and regulation of executive action supposed to be necessary for the safety of the people; and this express and special grant of such extraordinary powers, not in any way related to or growing out of general Senatorial duty, and in itself a departure from the general plan of our Government, should be held, under a familiar maxim of construction, to exclude every other right of interference with executive functions.

In the first Congress which assembled after the adoption of the Constitution, comprising many who aided in its preparation, a legislative construction was given to that instrument in which the independence of the Executive in the matter of removals from office was fully sustained.

I think it will be found that in the subsequent discussions of this question there was generally, if not at all times, a proposition pending to in some way curtail this power of the President by legislation, which furnishes evidence that to limit such power it was supposed to be necessary to supplement the Constitution by such legislation.

The first enactment of this description was passed under a stress of partisanship and political bitterness which culminated in the President's impeachment.

This law provided that the Federal officers to which it applied could only be suspended during the recess of the Senate when shown by evidence satisfactory to the President to be guilty of misconduct in office, or crime, or when incapable or disqualified to perform their duties, and that within twenty days after the next meeting of the Senate it should be the duty of the President "to report to the Senate such suspension, with the evidence and reasons for his action in the case."

This statute, passed in 1867, when Congress was overwhelmingly and bitterly opposed politically to the President, may be regarded as an indication that even then it was thought necessary by a Congress determined upon the subjugation of the Executive to legislative will to furnish itself a law for that purpose, instead of attempting to reach the object intended by an invocation of any pretended constitutional right.

The law which thus found its way to our statute-book was plain in its terms, and its intent needed no avowal. If valid and now in operation it would justify the present course of the Senate and command the obedience of the Executive to its demands. It may, however, be remarked in passing that, under this law, the President had the privilege of presenting to the body which assumed to review his executive acts his reasons therefor, instead of being excluded from explanation or judged by papers found in the Departments.

Two years after the law of 1867 was passed, and within less than five weeks after the inauguration of a President in political accord with both branches of Congress, the sections of the act regulating suspensions from office during the recess of the Senate were entirely repealed, and in their place were substituted provisions which, instead of limiting the causes of suspension to misconduct, crime, disability, or disqualification, expressly permitted such suspension by the President "in his discretion," and completely abandoned the requirement obliging him to report to the Senate "the evidence and reasons" for his action.

With these modifications and with all branches of the Government in political harmony, and in the absence of partisan incentive to captious obstruction, the law as it was left by the amendment of 1869 was much less destructive of executive discretion. And yet the great general and patriotic citizen who on the 4th day of March, 1869, assumed the duties of Chief Executive, and for whose freer administration of his high office the most hateful restraints of the law of 1867 were, on the 5th day of April, 1869, removed, mindful of his obligation to defend and protect every prerogative of his great trust, and apprehensive of the injury threatened the public service in the continued operation of these statutes even in their modified form, in his first message to Congress advised their repeal and set forth their unconstitutional character and hurtful tendency in the following language:

"It may be well to mention here the embarrassment possible to arise from leaving on the statute-books the so-called 'tenure-of-office acts' and to earnestly recommend their total repeal. It could not have been the intention of the framers of the Constitution, when providing that appointments made by the President should receive the consent of the Senate, that the latter should have the power to retain in office persons placed there by Federal appointment against the will of the President. The law is inconsistent with a faithful and efficient administration of the Government. What faith can an Executive put in officials forced upon him, and those, too, whom he has suspended for reason? How will such officials be likely to serve an administration which they know does not trust them?"

I am unable to state whether or not this recommendation for a repeal of these laws has been since repeated. If it has not, the reason can probably be found in the experience which demonstrated the fact that the necessities of the political situation but rarely developed their vicious character.

And so it happens that after an existence of nearly twenty years of almost innocuous desuetude these laws are brought forth—apparently the repealed as well as the unrepealed—and put in the way of an Executive who is willing, if permitted, to attempt an improvement in the methods of administration.

The constitutionality of these laws is by no means admitted. But why should the provisions of the repealed law, which required specific cause for suspension and a report to the Senate of "evidence and reasons," be now, in effect, applied to the present Executive, instead of the law, afterward passed and unrepealed, which distinctly permits suspensions by the President "in his discretion," and carefully omits the requirement that "evidence and reasons for his action in the case" shall be reported to the Senate?

The requests and demands which by the score have for nearly three months been presented to the different Departments of the Government, whatever may be their form, have but one complexion. They assume the right of the Senate to sit in judgment upon the exercise of my exclusive discretion and executive function, for which I am solely responsible to the people from whom I have so lately received the sacred trust of office. My oath to support and defend the Constitution, my duty to the people who have chosen me to execute the powers of their great office and not to relinquish them, and my duty to the Chief Magistracy, which I must preserve unimpaired in all its dignity and vigor, compel me to refuse compliance with these demands.

To the end that the service may be improved, the Senate is invited to the fullest scrutiny of the persons submitted to them for public office, in recognition of the constitutional power of that body to advise and consent to their appointment. I shall continue, as I have thus far done, to furnish, at the request of the confirming body, all the information I possess touching the fitness of the nominees placed before them for their action, both when they are proposed to fill vacancies and to take the place of suspended officials. Upon a refusal to confirm I shall not assume the right to ask the reasons for the action of the Senate nor question its determination. I can not think that anything more is required to secure worthy incumbents in public office than a careful and independent discharge of our respective duties within their well-defined limits.

Though the propriety of suspensions might be better assured if the action of the President was subject to review by the Senate, yet if the Constitution and the laws have placed this responsibility upon the executive branch of the Government, it should not be divided nor the discretion which it involves relinquished.

It has been claimed that the present Executive having pledged himself not to remove officials except for cause, the fact of their suspension implies such misconduct on the part of a suspended official as injures his character and reputation, and therefore the Senate should review the case for his vindication.

I have said that certain officials should not, in my opinion, be removed during the continuance of the term for which they were appointed solely for the purpose of putting in their place those in political affiliation with the appointing power, and this declaration was immediately followed by a description of official partisanship which ought not to entitle those in whom it was exhibited to consideration. It is not apparent how an adherence to the course thus announced carries with it the consequences described. If in any degree the suggestion is worthy of consideration, it is to be hoped that there may be a defense against unjust suspension in the justice of the Executive.

Every pledge which I have made by which I have placed a limitation upon my exercise of executive power has been faithfully redeemed. Of course the pretense is not put forth that no mistakes have been committed; but not a suspension has been made except it appeared to my satisfaction that the public welfare would be improved thereby. Many applications for suspension have been denied, and the adherence to the rule laid down to govern my actions as to such suspensions has caused much irritation and impatience on the part of those who have insisted upon more changes in the offices.

The pledges I have made were made to the people, and to them I am responsible for the manner in which they have been redeemed. I am not responsible to the Senate, and I am unwilling to submit my actions and official conduct to them for judgment.

There are no grounds for an allegation that the fear of being found false to my professions influences me in declining to submit to the demands of the Senate. I have not constantly refused to suspend officials, and thus incurred the displeasure of political friends, and yet willfully broken faith with the people for the sake of being false to them.

Neither the discontent of party friends nor the allurements constantly offered of confirmations of appointees conditioned upon the avowal that suspensions have been made on party grounds alone, nor the threat proposed in the resolutions now before Senate that no confirmations will be made unless the demands of that body be complied with, are sufficient to disbourage or deter me from following in the way which I am convinced leads to better government for the people.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, D. C., March 1, 1886.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the message be printed and lie upon the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On that I ask for the yeas and nays. I do not propose that it shall lie on the table just now, if I can help it.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the message be printed, if the Senator will allow me to modify my motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well. On that motion I should like to say a word, if there is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the message be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I add to that an amendment that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the message be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRIS. I have no——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I believe I have the floor just now.

Mr. HARRIS. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to say that I have no objection——

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will allow me, I will go on to say what I wish to say.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has the floor on the question of reference.

Mr. HARRIS. I will not interrupt the Senator, though I do desire——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say a word. I did not doubt that the Senator from Tennessee did not intend to cut off any observations that might be made. I simply wish to remark in moving to refer this document to the Committee on the Judiciary that it very vividly brought to my mind the communications of King Charles I to the Parliament, telling them what in conducting their affairs they ought to do and ought not to do, and I think I am safe in saying that it is the first time in the history of the republican United States that any President of the United States has undertaken to interfere with the deliberations of either House of Congress on questions pending before them otherwise than by messages on the state of the Union which the Constitution commands him to make from time to time. This message is devoted simply to a question for the Senate itself in regard to itself that it has under consideration. That is its singularity. I think it will strike reflecting people in this country as somewhat extraordinary, if in this day of reform anything at all can be thought extraordinary.

I only wish to add to what I have said the statement, so that it shall go with this message, so far as the newspapers will do me the honor to have it go, that the President of the United States has, unintentionally no doubt, entirely misstated the question. The Senate of the United States in its communications to the heads of Departments, not his heads of Departments, but the heads of Departments created by law, directed them to transmit certain official papers; and that is all. The President of the United States undertakes to change the question into a consideration by the Senate of his reasons or motives for putting a civil officer, as it might be called, under arrest, with which the Senate has not undertaken in any way to make any question at all.

By every message that he has sent to this body—and they are all public—he has asked the Senate to advise and consent to the removal of one officer and the appointment of another. That is what he has done; and the Senate in calling for these papers, to say nothing of wider considerations about great deficiencies in the Department of Justice, is asked to remove these officers without knowing the condition of the administration of their offices. But I do not wish to go into that discussion now. I move that the message be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, for reasons that I may not refer to here, I have no desire nor will I consent to the discussion of the questions involved in the message at this time. I moved that the message be printed and lie upon the table, according to the universal custom of this body when the subject-matter had been reported upon by a committee; and the Senator from Vermont, as chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, had already laid upon your table an elaborate report upon the general questions to which this message refers. Hence my motion was the ordinary motion made here under the circumstances that surround us at this moment. I have made no earthly objection to the message going to the Committee on the Judiciary if the Senator from Vermont desires it to go there; but it is unusual, because the subject-matter of the message has already been reported upon by the Senator from Vermont, and therefore in accordance with the unbroken usages of the body I moved that the message be printed and lie upon the table. I now renew that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the message be printed and lie upon the table.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask a division of that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On that question the yeas and nays are asked for, as the Chair understands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I made a motion to refer, and the Senator gave way to me and withdrew his motion to lay on the table and I made a motion to refer.

Mr. HARRIS. I first made the motion to print and lie upon the table, and upon the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont I modified the motion to one merely to print, and the Senator from Vermont suggested that he would move, or did move, that the message be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. That is the exact history of the transaction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but the Senator from Tennessee has a perfect right, pending my motion to refer, to move to lay on the table. There is no doubt about that, and on that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well. I make the motion that the message be printed and laid upon the table, and I join the Senator from Vermont in asking for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee that the message be printed and laid upon the table.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CAMERON (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BUTLER]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FAIR (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from California [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. PLUMB (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. RANSOM (when his name was called). I am paired on all party questions with the Senator from New York [Mr. MILLER]. If he were here, I should vote "yea" and he would doubtless vote "nay."

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. BOWEN. I am paired with the Senator from Florida [Mr. JONES].

Mr. ALDRICH. I am paired on political questions with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAMDEN]. I have transferred the pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], who is absent on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague [Mr. VEST] is detained at home by illness, but if here he would vote "yea." He is paired with the Senator from Kansas [Mr. PLUMB].

Mr. PLATT. I desire to say in behalf of my colleague [Mr. HAWLEY] that if here he would vote "nay."

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator from New York [Mr. EVARTS] is absent, and is paired with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN].

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—27.

Beck,	Eustis,	Jackson,	Riddleberger,
Berry,	George,	Jones of Arkansas,	Saulsbury,
Blackburn,	Gibson,	Kenna,	Vance,

Call,	Hawley,	Mitchell of Pa.,
Camden,	Jones of Florida,	Morgan,
Cameron,	Jones of Nevada,	Plumb,

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The question recurs on my motion to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the message be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the message be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

Mr. BLAIR. I give notice that immediately after the conclusion of the morning business to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to take up and proceed with the consideration of the education bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate on the 24th day of February, 1886.

POSTMASTER.

John H. Shaffer, to be postmaster at Kankakee, Kankakee County, Illinois.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 1, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. S. K. COX, of Washington, D. C.

The Journals of the proceedings of Friday and Saturday last were read and approved.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. WILKINS, for four days, on account of the death of a friend.

To Mr. ARNOT, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. LAIRD, indefinitely, by reason of the death of his brother.

To Mr. GIBSON, of West Virginia, until Wednesday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. CANDLER, for ten days, on account of important business.

TRUSTEE OF REFORM SCHOOL, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER, under the statute of May 31, 1876, announced the appointment of Mr. LE FEVRE as consulting trustee of the Reform School of the District of Columbia on the part of the House for the present Congress.

ABUSE OF THE PRIVILEGES OF THE FLOOR.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BEACH. The question I raise is one affecting the dignity and integrity of the proceedings of this House. I will send to the desk a copy of the New York Times of Friday last, the 26th of February, and ask the Clerk to read an article which forms the basis of the question of privilege I now raise.

The Clerk proceeded to read as follows:

Captain Eads has secured a report from the Commerce Committee for his ship-railway scheme, and it goes on the Calendar along with the Hennepin Canal, the Erie Canal, and the Maryland and Delaware Canal bills. There are friends for all of these schemes. Eads's undertaking pledges the United States to assure the incorporators of the canal net profits to the extent of $2,500,000 a year for fifteen years; the Hennepin Canal calls for an expenditure that may be $8,000,000 or $10,000,000; the Erie bill calls for $5,000,000 of Government money; the Maryland bill asks as a beginning for $1,000,000. The Tehuantepec Ship Railway is expected to get the votes of members from the South and Southwest, because those sections are interested in it as a measure calculated to draw trade from and through the Southwest. If the members from those sections want the bill to pass they will desire the assistance of the friends of the Hennepin scheme, who certainly do want their bill to go through. The votes in favor of the Erie Canal bill lent to Eads and to Hennepin would expect to get the Eads and Hennepin votes in return. Nothing but a log-rolling——

Mr. REAGAN (interrupting the reading). What paper is this that is being read?

Mr. BEACH. It is the New York Times of Friday last.

Mr. REAGAN. Why is it being read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York stated that he rose to a question of privilege, and sent this paper to the desk, with request to have an article read which he states forms the basis of the question of privilege——

Mr. REAGAN. What is the question of privilege?

The SPEAKER. But the Chair thinks before the gentleman can call for the reading of the paper he must present some motion or proposition to the House.

Mr. REAGAN. I asked what paper it was because I noticed that false statements are incorporated in it with reference to the public business before the House.

Mr. BEACH. I have offered it as prefatory to a motion which I am going to make, and which is the question of privilege to which I refer.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I do not see, Mr. Speaker, that what has been read raises any question of privilege anyway.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks, under the rulings made heretofore, that a proposition must be presented to the House in a case when a gentleman rises to a question of privilege which he states involves the dignity of the House or the integrity of its proceedings, and then the gentleman can support his proposition by any argument, or have anything read which he chooses in his own time, provided it is pertinent.

Mr. BEACH. If the honorable gentleman from Texas had not interrupted the reading of this paper, or had the Clerk been permitted to conclude it, the gentleman would have seen that a question of privilege is involved.

The article in question charges, and it not only appears in the New York Times but the press generally throughout the country make the charge, that Captain Eads has been upon the floor of the House during this session of Congress; and that, I submit, is a question of privilege. It is a question which affects the dignity of the House and the integrity of its proceedings.

And unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, that article is true. I know, of my own knowledge, that it is true. I have no personal acquaintance with Captain Eads, but I know him by sight, and I have seen him on the floor of the House during the sessions of the House recently engaged in conversation with members. Not only has Captain Eads abused the privileges of the floor, but they have been abused by many others. This fact is so well known to the members that I do not deem it necessary to raise a committee of investigation. I simply call attention to it, and ask that this House, in order to put a stop to the continuance of the abuse, will pass the resolution I now send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Doorkeeper of the House be, and he hereby is, directed, during the continuance of this Congress, to strictly enforce Rule XXXIV.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Is he not already instructed to do that by the rules?

The SPEAKER. That is the duty of the Doorkeeper and the officers of the House under the rule.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Why not extend the resolution by requiring that the officers of the House shall see that all of its rules are enforced?

Mr. REAGAN. Let me ask when was Captain Eads on the floor of the House while in session?

Mr. BEACH. If the gentleman addresses his inquiry to me personally, I will state that within the last ten days I have seen him on the floor of the House.

Mr. MORRISON. During the session of the House?

Mr. BEACH. During the session of the House.

Several MEMBERS. That is a mistake.

Mr. MORRISON. I do not believe he was on the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I have no idea that he ever was while the House was in session.

Mr. DUNHAM. Do you know Eads personally?

Mr. BEACH. I do by sight.

Mr. DUNHAM. And you have seen him on the floor?

Mr. BEACH. I have.

Mr. CLARDY. Do I understand the gentleman to say that Captain Eads was on the floor during the session of the House?

Mr. BEACH. That is just what I have said two or three times already.

Mr. CLARDY. I do not think he has been out of his bed during that time. He is sick.

Mr. HEARD. I desire to make the same statement as my colleague from Missouri. Mr. Eads has been sick, as I have been advised by his attorney, and confined to his room, I will not say for ten days, but for some time at least. I have never seen him on the floor of the House during this session, and I think the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] must be mistaken.

Mr. BEACH. Probably a large number of members have not seen him.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not believe Captain Eads was ever on the floor of the House during the session of the House.

Mr. BEACH. That statement simply raises the question of veracity between the gentleman from Texas and myself. I assert I have seen Mr. Eads on the floor of the House within the last ten days or two weeks.

Mr. REAGAN. The whole object seems to have been to introduce before the House an editorial from the New York Times. One of the statements of that editorial is that a bill has been reported here for the Tehuantepec Ship-canal, which guarantees $2,500,000 profits to the railroad annually. No such bill has been reported to the House. No bill that guarantees one cent of profit under any possible circumstances to the company has been reported to the House. I suppose the object is to start this slander on a measure in order to create a public sentiment against it before members have had a chance to consider it on its merits.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. STEELE. I make the point of order that the gentleman is out of order, and I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks there is nothing before the House but the resolution.

Mr. BURROWS. I move that the resolution be laid on the table.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BURROWS, it was agreed to; and the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. BEACH addressed the Chair.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. BEACH. I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. STEELE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York states that he offers another resolution, which may be privileged. The resolution will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is asserted in the public press that Rule XXXIV——

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLAND. I do not understand that this is offered as a question of privilege.

Mr. BEACH. I do offer the resolution as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair so understood the gentleman. The resolution will be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is asserted in the public press that Rule XXXIV, regulating admission to the floor of the House, is being violated: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be instructed to inquire into the facts, and report as to the truth or falsity of the said charges and what remedy, if any, is necessary to secure a strict enforcement of the rule.

Mr. BLAND. That could come in its regular order. I submit that the resolution is not in order now.

Mr. DUNHAM. Let the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this presents a question of privilege.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Would it be in order to move to amend the resolution by including in it the rule which prohibits smoking?

The SPEAKER. The resolution is open to amendment.

Mr. BEACH. I am willing to accept that amendment.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I would like also to have the Committee on Rules define what is meant by the "floor of the House." There are many gentlemen who think that they may smoke anywhere outside the seats without being guilty of an infraction of the rules. I call the attention of the House to the fact, because I am in the habit of violating this rule as much as anybody else.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Indiana propose an amendment?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I desire to include also Rule XIV, and to instruct the committee to inquire whether that rule is being violated, and to define what is meant by "on the floor of the House."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will please reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. REAGAN. While the gentleman is formulating his amendment, I would like to ask if the House really proposes to enter into a solemn investigation, whether somebody has been on the floor that was not entitled to be there? If there was such a violation of the rule why was not the point made at the time, so that any one violating the rule could have been sent out of the House?

Mr. BEACH. I will state, in answer to the gentleman from Texas, that not only Captain Eads but others have violated the privileges of the floor. I wanted to put a stop to this abuse. That is the reason why I have offered this resolution.

Mr. REAGAN. A stop could have been put to it at once by calling attention to the fact and having the rule read. But I can see no reason for a formal Congressional investigation as to whether somebody has been here on the floor who was not entitled to that privilege.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I send up my amendment. It can be inserted at the proper place.

The Clerk read the proposed amendment, as follows:

Amend the resolution by inserting "clause 7 Rule XIV, and to define what is meant by the 'floor of the House.'"

The SPEAKER. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HAMMOND. Before the amendment is voted upon, I desire simply to say that the question whether there has been a violation of Rule XXXIV, whether persons have been on the floor not coming within the rule, is a serious one. And if that rule has been violated those who have been violating it ought to be exposed. The effort to ingraft upon the resolution the amendment about smoking is simply an effort to introduce a thing which is ridiculous in comparison with a graver question.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. It occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment is not at all ridiculous. I think it is a matter of a great deal of concern to members of the House, especially those who do not smoke, and it ought to be a matter of some importance to those who do smoke. They ought to be taught the purport of the rule in this way, if they are not able to understand it without the appointment of a committee of investigation.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I submit that to the average member there is something apparently ridiculous in the whole matter. We have a rule of the House prohibiting intrusion upon the floor by any persons not mentioned in the rules as entitled to come upon the floor. The officers of the House are charged with the execution of that rule, and, so far as I know, it has been most rigidly enforced. If there has been now and then a violation of it, such violations have been extremely rare.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Not so as to violations of the rule against smoking on the floor.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Violations of the rule governing admission to the floor have been exceedingly rare, and all that is necessary in order to put a stop to them is to bring them to the attention of the officers of the House. If that is done I know from our experience in the past that the rule will be enforced. Now, so far as the rule against smoking is concerned, that rule has been repeatedly read during this Congress, but gentlemen who are smoking in their seats when their attention is called to it simply retire to the rear of the desks and continue to smoke at some point there, believing in good faith, I suppose, that they may do so without violating the rule.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Has the gentleman from Indiana himself violated the rule in that way? He has told us that he has been one of the most frequent violators of the rule generally.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I know of no rule of law that requires me to criminate myself. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLIKEN. That is entirely satisfactory, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am in earnest and in entire good faith in calling the attention of the House to the violation of this rule. It is offensive to many gentlemen, and the rule of the House ought to be observed—ought to be observed in good faith—and gentlemen should know that the floor of the House upon which smoking is prohibited means anywhere this side of the cloak-rooms. Therefore, if we are to investigate this question of the violation of our rules, I hope that this rule, which is more frequently violated than any other, will be included, so that we may have it enforced in the future.

Mr. BEACH. I did not suppose, Mr. Speaker, that this simple resolution offered by me, which was intended more in the nature of an admonition to the Doorkeeper to perform his duties than for any other purpose, would give rise to so much smoke. [Laughter.] I now ask the previous question on the amendment and on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment offered by Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana; and on a division there were—ayes 85, noes 51.

Mr. BEACH. No quorum has voted. I demand the tellers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] makes the point that no quorum has voted. The Chair appoints as tellers the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH].

Mr. BEACH (before the vote by tellers was completed). Mr. Speaker, no further count is demanded.

The SPEAKER. No further count is demanded. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. NEECE. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to lay the resolution as amended on the table.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 71, noes 54.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays. I want to know who is in favor of enforcing the rules of the House.

The question being taken by a rising vote, 27 members voted in the affirmative.

A MEMBER. Count the other side.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 110. Less than one-fifth of the last vote voting in the affirmative, the ayes and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was then agreed to.

CALL OF STATES AND TERRITORIES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will proceed, under the rule, to call the States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions. Under this call petitions and memorials from State and Territorial Legislatures are in order, and also resolutions of inquiry addressed to the heads of Departments.

STEPHEN C. SLAYTON.

Mr. FORNEY introduced a bill (H. R. 5895) granting a pension to Stephen C. Slayton; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

QUARANTINE STATION AT SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. HENLEY also introduced a bill (H. R. 5914) to establish a quarantine station at the port of San Francisco; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WAGES OF SEAMEN.

Mr. MORROW introduced a bill (H. R. 5915) to amend section 4536 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the wages of seamen; which was read a first and second time.

The SPEAKER. This bill will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORROW. This proposed amendment to the Revised Statutes relates to seamen's wages, a subject which we find embraced in the bill reported from the Select Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests.

The SPEAKER. That may be; but under the rules of the House the Chair thinks a proposition which relates to judicial process and the exemption of certain property from attachment should properly go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORROW. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be referred to the Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests.

There being no objection, the bill was referred to the Committee on American Ship-building and Ship-owning Interests, and was ordered to be printed.

SECTION 793 REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. MORROW also introduced a bill (H. R. 5916) to amend section 793 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN RYAN.

Mr. LOUTTIT introduced a bill (H. R. 5921) granting an increase of pension to John Ryan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

MINERAL LANDS.

Mr. McKENNA introduced a bill (H. R. 5922) to enable the State of California to take lands in lieu of the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections found to be mineral lands; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES H. CHAPMAN.

Mr. WAIT introduced a bill (H. R. 5923) for the relief of James H. Chapman, assistant paymaster of the United States Navy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

TAXATION OF PETROLEUM.

Mr. BUCK submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be requested to communicate to the House of Representatives, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of the recent correspondence and dispatches between the Secretary of State and the minister of the United States at The Hague touching the subject of taxation of petroleum in Holland and in the Dutch colonies and that of the export therefrom of leaf-tobacco to the United States.

PATENT LAWS.

Mr. MITCHELL introduced a bill (H. R. 5924) to provide for the revision, improvement, and amendment of the laws relating to patents for useful inventions; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

REPEALING PATENT LAWS.

Mr. LORE introduced a bill (H. R. 5925) to repeal the patent laws now in force and to establish another system of reward for inventors; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

LIGHT-HOUSE, ANCLOTE KEYS, FLORIDA.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida, introduced a bill (H. R. 5926) making an appropriation for the completion of a light-house at Anclote Keys, west coast of Florida; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LOUISA KEARNEY.

Mr. DAVIDSON, of Florida (by request), also introduced a bill (H. R. 5927) for the relief of Louisa Kearney; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN JUMPER.

TRANSPORTATION OF UNITED STATES MAILS.

Mr. BURROWS, in accordance with consent already granted, presented the views of the minority of the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads upon the bill (H. R. 4864) to enforce the obligation to carry the mails of the United States; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the majority.

EXPENSES OF AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture:

Resolved, That the Commissioner of Agriculture be instructed to furnish for the information of the House a statement showing what portion of the $51,500 appropriated for the "chemical division" and "laboratory" for the present fiscal year has been expended and for what purpose, giving a detailed statement of all expenditures and of the balance on hand.

PROPOSED IMPEACHMENT OF SECRETARY OF TREASURY.

Mr. BRUMM. I hold in my hand a petition of sundry citizens, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD—the body of the petition, without the names. It is a petition of Samuel P. Brigham and others, asking for the impeachment of Daniel Manning, Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, for high crimes and misdemeanors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to present this petition and have the body of it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BEACH and others objected.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This being the first Monday of the month, the Chair, as the next business in order, will entertain motions of individual members for suspension of the rules.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT WILLIAMSPORT, PA.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I move to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of House bill No. 2148, and to pass the same with the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill, after which the Chair will ask for a second upon the motion to suspend the rules.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2148) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a building for the use of the United States circuit and district courts of the United States, the post-office, and other Government offices at Williamsport, Pa.," and making an additional appropriation therefor.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the first section of the act entitled "An act to provide a building for the use of the United States circuit and district courts of the United States, post-office, and other Government offices at Williamsport, Pa.," approved August 3, 1882, be, and the same is hereby, amended by substituting the words "two hundred thousand dollars" in the place of the words "one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars;" so that the first section of said act, as amended, shall read as follows: "Shall not exceed the cost of two hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars."

SEC. 2. That the sum of $50,000, in addition to the sum heretofore appropriated, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to be expended and used, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purchase of additional grounds, and for the prosecution of the work of constructing and furnishing materials therefor.

Mr. EDEN. I demand a second on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

Mr. EDEN. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. In the absence of objection a second will be considered as ordered. Under the rules thirty minutes will now be allowed for debate, fifteen minutes for and fifteen minutes against the motion to suspend the rules. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] to control the time in support of the motion and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] to control the time in opposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask the gentleman to let the report be read in his time.

Mr. EDEN. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read in the time of the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, submitted the following report, to accompany bill H. R. 2148:

The Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2148) to amend an act to provide a public building for the use of the United States circuit and district courts, post-office, and other Government offices at Williamsport, Pa., and making additional appropriations therefor, respectfully submit the following report:

That in the first session of the Forty-seventh Congress a bill was introduced and passed the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, appropriating what was at that time deemed a sufficient sum to purchase grounds and erect the proper building thereon. This bill was, however, amended in the House, reducing the amount to $100,000. Under the provision of this act more than a year's time was spent in trying to secure a location for a price that the limited appropriation would justify for ground expenditure. One location was fixed by a commission appointed for the purpose, but was rejected by the Secretary of the Treasury for the reason that the price charged for it was so great that the money left after paying for the same would not construct a building anywhere near the capacity demanded by the present wants of the district to be benefited.

A second location was finally fixed upon and the purchase of a lot made, but as it only includes part of a square and is cut off by a strip of 70 feet frontage from one of the streets bordering it, the Supervising Architect, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, recommended the postponement of the plans for the building and the purchase of material until, if possible, further appropriation could be secured through act of Congress. Accordingly, in the Forty-eighth Congress a bill was introduced and received a unanimous report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in its favor. A portion of this report is incorported herein and adopted by this committee:

"The city of Williamsport is one of the most rapidly-growing cities in Western Pennsylvania. It had in 1880 a population of nearly 19,000, and at present is the center of a lumbering business equal to that of any city east of the Alleghany Mountains.

"The internal-revenue receipts for 1882 were $242,357; for 1883, $252,287.

"An appropriation was made in 1882 of $50,000, and the limit fixed for the whole building and grounds at $100,000. A lot of 130 feet front has been recently purchased, but it is separated from the west side of the square by a lot of 70 feet frontage. By purchasing the latter the whole square, 200 by 204 feet, will belong to the Government, and the building can then be located beyond external fire hazard and so as to command the view of the streets converging at this point. In his letter upon this point the Supervising Architect states that 'the limit of $200,000 stated in the bill, including site, would be no greater sum than is necessary for the erection of a suitable building for the purposes required.'"

Twenty counties in the State of Pennsylvania are dependent upon the United States courts located at Williamsport as the place to transact such legal business as they have in these courts. They are the counties of Bradford, Cameron, Centre, Clearfield, Clinton, Columbia, Elk, Juniata, Lackawanna, Luzerne, Lycoming, McKean, Mifflin, Montour, Northumberland, Potter, Snyder, Sullivan, Susquehanna, Tioga, Union, and Wyoming, and contain an area of 15,458 square miles.

This district had a population in 1880 of 834,490. It includes the largest share of the great anthracite coal region of the State, and has ten bituminous coal-producing counties within its limits. Many of the counties have extensive lumbering and bark interests, the counties of Cameron, Clearfield, Elk, McKean, Potter, and Tioga containing more timber and bark than all the other counties in the State of Pennsylvania. Williamsport is the central point for the manufacture of this great product, and has manufactured during the last ten years from four to five hundred million per annum. That city contained near 20,000 population in 1880, and recent estimates and thorough canvass in making up directories this year fixes the population between 28,000 and 29,000. Within the past two years more than nine hundred new buildings, at a cost of $1,300,000, have been constructed. Within the same time a new bridge across the Susquehanna has been built at a cost of $35,000. An electric-light plant, with a paid-up capital of $75,000, and a public steam-heating plant, with a paid-up capital of $100,000, have within the past year been put in operation, and within the same time 2 miles of pavement have been laid. The receipts of the post-office in Williamsport during the year 1885 amounted to the sum of $29,204.23, being an increase over the year 1884 of $495.34, and the net income to the Government during 1885 over all expenditures was $16,183.83.

The county of McKean, located within this Congressional district, is by far the largest petroleum producing county in the United States. Indeed, during the last decade, from one-half to two-thirds of all the oil produced in this country came from territory within the limits of McKean County. Petroleum is now one of the largest exports of American product. Since 1881 it has averaged above $48,000,000 annually, and for the year 1885 it was above $49,000,000. When it is remembered that a single county in the sixteenth Congressional district produces more than half of this export trade each year, something of the necessities for proper court facilities may be understood. The counties comprising the district to be benefited by the construction of a United States court building at Williamsport are, most of them, the old counties of the State, and with all their several interests to be settled in the United States courts, up to the present time no place has been provided for the reception or protection of court records, though there is now the accumulation of forty years.

It is believed that notwithstanding the large revenues derived to the Government from the various products of nature and the taxes paid by its people, not a single dollar, prior to 1882, when the first appropriation for this building was authorized, has ever been made for public improvements within the limits of the sixteenth Congressional district of Pennsylvania. That the great demands for a court-house and post-office be supplied at as early a date as possible, and that the building when constructed shall be adequate to the wants of the near future as well as the present, the committee report favorably on this bill and recommend its passage, with the following amendments: Section 1: In line 12, strike out the word "fifty" and insert the word "twenty-five," and in line 9, between the word "hundred" and the word "thousand," insert the words "and twenty-five."

Mr. EDEN. I state, Mr. Speaker, the reason why I made the objection was because it seems these bills for the erection of and extension of public buildings are continually being brought before the House. There are a great many in course of erection and a great many more which are in anticipation. Bills as originally enacted fix a limit that seems to be reasonable, and the House passes the bill under the belief that limit will be regarded, and that will be all the money which will be expended; but such is the reverse of what happens. After the work has been inaugurated we have propositions coming here for an increase of appropriation, and far beyond the limit fixed in the original law. I did not catch the amount of the increase in this case; will the gentleman from Pennsylvania inform me what it is precisely?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. EDEN. In addition to the $200,000 in the limit?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois that instead of going on experimenting with the money previously appropriated, the Architect, discovering that it would be impossible to erect a building to meet the public wants for the sum appropriated, postponed the work until sufficient appropriation could be made to provide for a proper, suitable, and complete building.

Mr. EDEN. Has any work been done upon the building?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. No; the plan has not even been drawn. The whole thing remains in abeyance until an adequate appropriation can be made.

Mr. EDEN. It occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, they could erect a good public building for $200,000, and sufficient to accommodate this place of 19,000 population.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I wish to state in this connection that has been the difficulty from the beginning. It has been found that the amount appropriated, $100,000, while it would provide a post-office and other Government offices, still would not be sufficient to provide also proper court facilities.

Gentlemen will observe that a population of more than a million is to be accommodated at this place. It includes the great anthracite region as well as the petroleum country. A vast amount of business is done in this center.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has seven minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. EDEN. I will reserve it. Before resuming my seat I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania why the sum of $200,000 will not answer the purpose?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I will answer candidly I fear it would not answer. I wish to state further to the gentleman that that has been the difficulty from the beginning. If the bill as originally recommended in the Forty-seventh Congress had been allowed to pass without amendment there would have been no necessity for coming back for an additional appropriation. The amendment to the bill when originally proposed has been the cause of all of the difficulty in regard to those public building bills.

Mr. DIBBLE. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have given full and careful consideration to this and other bills before them, and have realized the force of the objection made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] in relation to the extension of the limits of public buildings. But that has arisen in the present case from the fact that the original limit was too small for the purpose intended, and it is the opinion of the committee after careful examination that the amount asked for in this bill is the minimum amount adequate for the purpose.

And I would beg leave further to say, Mr. Speaker, for the information of the House, that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have endeavored to adopt, as a precaution against the recurrence of such increases in the future, a provision which is incorporated into all of the original bills which may be presented to the House at this session from the committee—not only the ordinary provision fixing a limit of cost, but one providing further that before the Secretary of the Treasury shall approve the expenditure of one cent of the money appropriated the Architect of the Treasury must submit an estimate, carefully prepared, by which it will be shown that the expenditure for the site and the expenditure for the building as estimated, allowing for the space required for the public offices, will not exceed that limit. That has to be submitted as preliminary even to the purchase of the site, so that we are surrounding the future appropriations for public buildings with every possible safeguard to preclude the necessity for extensions of limit hereafter.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I now yield two minutes to my colleague [Mr. BAYNE].

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I am acquainted with the necessities of this situation, and I am quite sure that the money appropriated for this purpose will be judiciously appropriated, as the building proposed to be erected is one of public importance and necessity. Its location is in the region of the great oil-fields of Pennsylvania, the product of which brings into this country from foreign nations between fifty and sixty millions of dollars annually, and in the last twelve months saved us from having the balance of trade charged against us. The courts of Western Pennsylvania have litigation about railroads, about navigation, and the varied interests of our end of the State are so great that there is of necessity an immense amount of business in all the courts of Western Pennsylvania.

In this town of Williamsport there is a United States court; and the judge of the district court for Western Pennsylvania holds two terms a year, I believe, at which a large number of cases are tried. Population all about there is increasing, and I am satisfied that if the Architect of the Treasury forms his estimates on the wants of that section for the present, in a very few years such a building will not be adequate to the demands made upon it. I feel sure that this building is needed, and the bill should receive the support of every member of Congress who wishes to provide for an actually existing public necessity.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I reserve the remainder of the time so that I may use it if it be necessary.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. BEACH. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Very well.

Mr. BEACH. I do not propose to consume a great deal of time, but there is certain information which I think should be in the possession of the House before it proceeds to vote upon this bill. I would like to know the amount of rent that the Government now pays for the post-office in that location. I do not know whether the report states the amount or not.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I do not know that the report in this respect answers the question of the gentleman from New York exactly; but one year ago $2,000 was paid for the rent.

Mr. BEACH. Does the report state the facts in that respect?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I do not think it does.

Mr. BEACH. And can the gentleman answer as to the amount of revenue collected there, and the rents paid for the accommodations of the judges and courts?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I think the amount paid is about the same as that paid for the post-office, although I am not certain. I might say for the information of the gentleman from New York that the authorities have not been able to rent a proper place to hold the courts, and they have no place now in which to preserve the valuable records of forty years of court business.

Mr. BEACH. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania then to say that the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds have reported a bill here recommending this appropriation without entering into an investigation as to the amount of revenue derived, of postal revenue, or the amount the Government is obliged to pay for the rent of the post-office, as well as the amount of rent for a building for the accommodation of the court. This is very important information, and should be in the possession of the House.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. All of these have been investigated.

Mr. BEACH. But I ask if they are incorporated in the report?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Perhaps not, these particular items to which you refer, but the matters to which I have referred are incorporated in the report, and the importance of the bill is fully set forth.

I desire now, Mr. Chairman, to yield three minutes to my colleague, Governor CURTIN.

Mr. CURTIN. Mr. Speaker, the court at Williamsport has been held for a long time, as long back as I can remember, and with very insufficient accommodations. It is a court for all of the northern part of Pennsylvania; and if any public building is required anywhere it certainly is required there. It is not in my district, although it is in a part of Pennsylvania with which I should be familiar and of which I should know something as to what is required for the accommodation of the public.

Mr. Speaker, I hold wherever it is proper on account of population, or of business, or for the accommodation of the people to put a public building it is a duty, and I am ready to vote for it. I believe that this great Government should have the business of the people transacted in their own buildings, where there can be proper accommodations and safety, and not be renting buildings to be prepared for its occupancy.

I have no more to say than that, in my judgment, it is perfectly proper and perfectly legitimate, in view of the interrogatories of the gentleman from New York, to say that I hardly think the committee should be expected to put all of these things into its report. You might as well expect a jury in making their verdict to put in the evidence. [Laughter.]

Mr. EDEN. Is the time for debate exhausted?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] has still five minutes under his control and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] has seven minutes.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I desire to reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. EDEN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER].

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I only desire to ask a question. I understood the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DIBBLE] to say that this bill contained a provision restricting the expenditure to the amount provided in the bill; and not only that, but that it prohibited the Secretary of the Treasury from making a contract that would involve any more. I do not see that provision in the bill.

Mr. DIBBLE. The gentleman from Ohio misapprehended my remark. I stated that I recognized that this coming back for increases was an evil arising from the framing of the bills when originally introduced; that in this Congress the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds had framed a rule under which when a building was authorized those provisions were put in. So that not even the site could be purchased until a full estimate had been made and submitted and approved within the limits of cost.

But this is the case of an increase of appropriation, and the site has already been purchased on the greater portion of it. The report describes a small piece additional to be purchased, and in the judgment of the committee the requirements for the public records of a court of the United States, and a very important court, together with the requirements for the other public offices, justify this amount of expenditure, judging from experience in the cost of buildings under similar circumstances.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Then I ask my friend from Pennsylvania what assurance we have when this amount has been appropriated that it will complete the building or that more will not be called for under the plans and specifications as made?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. You have the assurance that the architect has said that the amount is sufficient, and that assurance was never given before.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But there is nothing of that kind in the bill. It seems to me the bill should contain such a provision.

Mr. DIBBLE. It says it shall not exceed in cost this amount of $225,000.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But that does not prohibit the Secretary going on under specifications that will require a larger amount before we get through.

Mr. DIBBLE. I think it does.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. On whose recommendation is this asked? Was it recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. It was.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania when it was the Secretary of the Treasury made the recommendation of an increase?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The Secretary made this recommendation more than a year or two years ago—at the beginning of the last Congress.

Mr. EDEN. For how much?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. The amount named in the bill.

Mr. EDEN. I wish merely to add to what I stated before that I called attention to this increase of appropriations for this public building for the reason that, judging by what is transpiring at the other end of the Capitol, we are likely to have a very large number of these public buildings; and if we indulge in extravagant appropriations for these court-houses at places of 15,000 or 20,000 inhabitants, we will run up a large bill before we get through. I have no objection to a reasonable and proper appropriation for this building, but I do not think $225,000 is necessary for a public building at a small place like this.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me a word?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I yield the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] two minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. This bill was before the last Congress, and in the closing hours of that Congress it was practically reached for consideration under an agreement made by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations at that time that bills of this character should be brought forward and placed upon the sundry civil appropriation bill. It happened that I was presiding at the moment and intended to recognize for the next motion of this kind the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN], but the time was very short. Twelve o'clock of the 4th of March was rapidly approaching; it was then about 8 o'clock on the morning of the 4th of March; and in order to save the sundry civil bill and an extra session of Congress, a motion was made to suspend the rules and dispose of all the business at once. So that this bill by that parliamentary motion failed of consideration at that time. I regretted it, because I felt at the time injustice had been done to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Therefore I cordially support this bill, and think it ought to pass.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman from Illinois for the statement he has just made to the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether $225,000 was the sum mentioned in the bill of last session?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. That was not the amount mentioned in the bill of last session. But the 70 feet of land required to be purchased made the necessary increase.

Mr. HOLMAN. What was the amount mentioned in the bill of last session?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was what I thought.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. If no other question is to be asked about this I call for a vote.

Mr. MORRISON. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment? I would like to know if this bill my colleague [Mr. SPRINGER] was talking about a moment ago is the old bill with $50,000 added? Is this the same bill increased $50,000?

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Oh, no; there is $25,000 added; 70 feet more ground have to be purchased.

Mr. MORRISON. Which you did not know you wanted two years ago.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. Oh, yes; we knew we wanted it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BROWN] to suspend the rules and pass the bill that has been read with the amendments reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The question being taken, the rules were suspended (two-thirds voting in favor thereof), and the bill, with the amendments, was passed.

PUBLIC BUILDING, FORT SMITH.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (S. 610) to provide for a public building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal revenue and other civil offices, and the United States jail in the city of Fort Smith, Ark., and put the same upon its passage, with the amendments reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause to be constructed at Forth Smith, in the State of Arkansas, on block 514, as the same is described on the map of the reserve addition to the city of Fort Smith, Ark., as surveyed by George H. Lyman, and approved by the Interior Department November 8, A. D. 1884, and which block was heretofore reserved, selected, and set apart for that purpose, a suitable building, with fire-proof vaults extending to each story, for the accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and internal-revenue and other Government offices; and for this purpose there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $125,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall cause proper plans and estimates to be made so that no expenditure shall be made or authorized for the full completion of said building beyond the amount herein appropriated: Provided, That the building shall be so situated as to leave an open space around the same of not less than 40 feet in width.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remodel and construct, out of and from the building now owned and used by the United States as a United States court-house and jail, located within the walls of the abandoned military reservation at Fort Smith, Ark., a suitable jail for the care and confinement of United States prisoners; and for this purpose there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall cause plans and estimates to be made so that no expenditure shall be made or authorized for the completion of said building beyond the amount herein appropriated.

The amendments were read, as follows:

The committee recommend that the sum of $100,000 be fixed as the limit of the cost of the court-house building, and the $25,000 be the limit of cost for the alteration of the present building necessary for the purposes of a jail; and to that end that the bill (S. 610) be amended as follows: Strike out the words "and twenty-five" between the words "hundred" and "thousand" in the first section of the bill; second, strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof, the words "twenty-five" between the words "sum of" and "thousand," in section 2 of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. BEACH. I demand a second.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] is entitled to fifteen minutes in support of the bill and the gentleman from New York [Mr. BEACH] is entitled to fifteen minutes in opposition to the bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from New York desires to occupy the floor now I will yield to him.

Mr. BEACH. Mr. Speaker, my purpose in demanding a second was simply that the House might have some explanation of this bill.

Mr. ROGERS. Very well.

Mr. Speaker, if I can have the attention of the House for a brief time, I think I can make such a statement as will satisfy the House of the merits of this bill.

As gentlemen are aware, the United States district court for the western district of Arkansas has criminal jurisdiction of nineteen counties in that State and also of the five civilized tribes of Indians. It was stated the other day before the Judiciary Committee (I have not made the calculation myself) that this court and one other transact 10 per cent. of the entire business of all the Federal courts. I know from the Attorney-General's report that it disposes of more business than any other one court in the country.

Mr. EDEN. Does the Government own the land on which it is proposed to erect this building?

Mr. ROGERS. Yes, sir; the Government owns the land upon which this jail is proposed to be constructed. It likewise owns a block of lots 300 feet square upon which the other building is proposed to be erected, and the block of lots is reserved by the Government for that purpose, and the location is entirely eligible.

During the past summer a Senate committee, composed of Senator DAWES, Senator MORGAN, and Senator JONES (the latter not being present), visited Fort Smith and inspected this jail and the building occupied by the court, and I am told that when this bill came up in the Senate committee the question was asked with surprise by the Senator from Massachusetts why it was that these improvements had not been made long since; and the record shows that when the bill was on its passage in the Senate he inquired whether the amount provided in it for the construction of the jail was sufficient to construct a proper building. The amount then was $125,000 for the court-house and $50,000 for the jail. The House committee, however, have cut down the appropriation. They have cut off $25,000 from the appropriation for the jail and the same amount from that for the court-house, leaving only $25,000 for the jail and $100,000 for the court-house. I wish now to invite the attention of the House briefly to a portion of the committee's report, which shows that during the year 1883 the cost of the transportation of prisoners from that jail to Detroit, Mich., was $5,706.60. It also shows that it cost the Government to guard the jail $600 a month, $7,200 a year.

It thus appears that these two items, the cost of transporting to Detroit prisoners who are convicted in that court and the cost of guarding the jail, amounts to something over $12,000 a year, a sum which would pay 4 per cent. on $300,000. Mr. Speaker, I proceed now to read briefly from the Attorney-General's report, which I may remark in passing merely reiterates what the Attorneys-General of the United States have said upon this subject in two previous annual reports. This is what the Attorney-General says:

THE JAIL AT FORT SMITH, ARK.

The United States court for the western district of Arkansas has criminal jurisdiction, in addition to those counties of the State comprised in said district, over that part of the Indian Territory set apart and occupied by the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek, and Seminole Indians, and it therefore happens that a large number of prisoners are held at Fort Smith. These are confined in what is commonly dignified by the title of the "United States jail," but which in reality is little better than a pen, in which white, Indian, and negro prisoners are indiscriminately huddled, and with none of the conveniences of modern prisons, such as hospital facilities, proper ventilation, &c. The place is, however, as its name indicates, the United States jail, and is under the exclusive control of the Government, to which, it must be admitted, it is a standing reproach. The expenses of its management are all paid by the Government, and it is under the immediate supervision of the United States marshal. This officer has done the best he could with the materials at hand, and it is not his fault that he is the nominal warden of the most miserable prison, probably, in the whole country.

The jail consists of two rooms, partially under ground, with barred doors and windows, but with no cell arrangements whatever. The rough stone floors are damp, and the air is fetid in spite of the plentiful use of lime and whitewash, as indeed it must be where fifty or more prisoners are confined, the sick and the well together, in a small space, almost utterly devoid of any of the modern sanitary appliances. It is not surprising, therefore, that the reports of the Detroit house of correction, in which United States prisoners sentenced from the western district of Arkansas are confined, are said to show that many of the deaths in that institution are among those convicts who were held in jail at Fort Smith previous to their trial and sentence.

Not only is the health of these prisoners almost certain to be impaired or ruined by this mode of imprisonment, but is is manifestly unjust and cruel to confine detained witnesses and boys charged with minor and first offenses in the same room with murderers and outlaws. Yet here this state of things exists, and is unavoidable under present circumstances.

The attention of Congress has been repeatedly invited to this subject in former reports of this Department, but without result, and I am now anxious to make the urgent necessity for immediate action fully apparent.

I therefore most earnestly repeat the recommendations of my predecessor, that Congress make provision for the building, by the Government, of a suitable jail at Fort Smith, in which the United States prisoners may be confined in a proper and humane manner. Such a building can be erected, if deemed expedient, partially or wholly by prison labor, as these prisoners are confined in abject idleness, and might be employed in the work with advantage to the Government and decided benefit to themselves.

Now this court is held in an old barracks, in which there is nothing except a plank floor to separate the court-room from the jail. This place, in which during 1883 the court, according to the clerk's report, sat two hundred and ninety-one days, is ventilated only at the two ends. In these two pens half under ground, the building being I believe about 55 feet by 58, there were kept in 1883, as shown by the certified report of the clerk, an average of seventy-eight prisoners throughout the entire year. In this court that year five hundred and eighty-eight cases were tried or disposed of.

What is worse than all else, there are, as stated by the Attorney-General, no provisions whatever for health or sanitary conveniences. There is not even a closet; and until recently they have not had even ordinary water facilities, which they now have by reason of the town having recently built water-works, and by the direction of the Department of Justice the water has been carried to the jail and provisions made for bathing.

In my judgment the sum of $125,000 is not sufficient to build this jail and court-house, but the committee have differed with me on that subject, and for the sake of humanity, in order that we may have some improvement upon the present state of things, I have consented, rather than have further delay and imperil the bill by antagonizing the amendment they have required, to ask its passage as it is, in the hope that it may be corrected in conference.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is shown by the papers before me that the court-house itself is leaky. The old slate roof on this abandoned army barracks allows the water to leak through, and I have Judge Parker's letter stating that the building must be abandoned unless some steps be speedily taken to improve it so that the sessions of the court may be held in a comfortable place. It is in these words:

AT CHAMBERS, UNITED STATES COURTS,
Fort Smith, Ark., December 12, 1883.

SIR: I write you to state to you the condition of the building here in which I hold court and the great necessity of the Government erecting a new court-house. As you are aware, the court is now held in a building belonging to the United States, which was used, when a military fort was located here, as a barracks for soldiers. The basement is now used as a jail and the court-room is immediately over the jail. The court-room is very poorly arranged. It has neither convenience nor comforts, and because it is over the jail is very unhealthy.

The clerk's and marshal's offices are most miserable affairs. They are much too small—have no conveniences whatever. The records in the clerk's office are in a very unprotected and unsafe condition. The roof of the building is a slate roof, very old, and now in such a condition that it can not be repaired. The roof leaks very badly. We will very soon have to vacate the building if something is not done.

The United States owns the land here, and the best remedy that suggests itself to me is for the Government to erect a new building.

As you are aware, the criminal business of this court is very heavy. The court affords protection to a large class of people in the Indian country. The civil business is heavy and increasing all the time. The necessity for a new court-house here at this time is greater than at any other place. That necessity is an immediate one. If in accordance with your views, I have to request that you recommend an appropriation by Congress for the erection of a building to be used as a court-house, and the present court-house can then be repaired for a jail.

I am, most truly, your obedient servant,

I. C. PARKER.

Hon. BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

I also read the Attorney-General's letter, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, December 18, 1883.

The Speaker of the House of Representatives:

I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of a letter from Hon. I. C. Parker, United States district judge for the western district of Arkansas, dated 12th instant, at Fort Smith, relative to the condition of the building now used for the United States courts and suggesting the necessity for the erection of a new building by the Government.

Your attention is invited to the statement of Judge Parker where he says, "The necessity for a new court-house here at this time is greater than at any other place. That necessity is an immediate one. If in accordance with your views, I have to request that you recommend an appropriation by Congress for the erection of a building to be used as a court-house and the present court-house can then be repaired for a jail."

I heartily indorse the suggestion of Judge Parker and respectfully recommend that an appropriation be made for the purpose mentioned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN HARRIS BREWSTER,
Attorney-General.

In 1870 the private building which had been rented for court purposes was burned to the ground; and I recollect very well (for my own law office was situated underneath the rooms occupied by the court) that herculean efforts were required to save the public records from destruction by fire; and, indeed, many of the court papers were destroyed or lost; the record books, however, were saved.

Here is a court sitting in an old building which is exposed to the peril of fire, uncomfortable, inconvenient, unsuitable, and without proper facilities for the dispatch of business of the court. In this building, as the clerk certifies, the court sits almost every day from 8 o'clock in the morning till sometimes half past 6 o'clock in the evening, and often holds night sessions. The court is in almost perpetual session the whole year round in a building where, according to the testimony of the officers of the court, the very stench from the prison rises and penetrates throughout the entire building, with no room fit for either the marshal, clerk, the juries, or officers of the court, and with a jail which, kept under the very best regulations, is simply horrible and inhuman.

It will thus be seen that there is no proper provision for the convenience of the court or the dispatch of its business or for the health and safety of the prisoners. The expense of transportation and of the necessary guard, which will be dispensed with by the construction of a new building, amounts to 4 per cent. upon $300,000, which is nearly three times as much as the committee propose by this bill to expend.

Mr. LONG. Can a suitable building be erected for $125,000?

Mr. ROGERS. My judgment is that it can not. The committee have thought otherwise.

Mr. LONG. How many prisoners are confined there?

Mr. ROGERS. As I have said, the number averages about seventy-seven the year round; and I can state from my personal knowledge that during the months of June and July of the past year about one hundred prisoners were confined there in two rooms 50 by 29 feet and a 7-foot ceiling when the thermometer stood at 90°. The talented and accomplished daughter of one of the Senators from Massachusetts accompanied the Senate committee last summer on their visit to this place and she went home horrified at this "black hole of Calcutta," and published in a Massachusetts periodical an article on the subject which does credit both to her head and her heart. I shall take the liberty of publishing this article in the RECORD in connection with my remarks:

A UNITED STATES PRISON.

ANNA L. DAWES.

Prisons or jails belonging to the United States itself are comparatively rare. The census of 1880 mentions but four, and the last report of the Attorney-General submits statements from these four, one of them being the jail at Washington city. The country has a right to expect that these few prisons under the control of the Government itself, supported by the nation and supervised by its own officers, shall be model institutions. We look to them for concrete examples of the latest discoveries in this direction. Pœnology is an exact science by this time, and some of its brightest triumphs have been achieved in our own land, while American adepts teach willing audiences from many countries. It is interesting, therefore, to see what the United States considers the best system. With all the resources of the nation behind her, and all the wisdom of her famous students of this awful science to guide her, we look anxiously for her conclusions. We ask what system has been adopted, what employment provided for her criminals, whether they work for the state or for contractors, how their day is arranged, what punishments are allowed.

Innumerable questions of interest to the student of social science immediately present themselves at the mention of a prison under the management and control of the United States Government.

In the western part of the State of Arkansas is located at the flourishing city of Fort Smith one of the few prisons belonging to the United States. This large and growing town, in the midst of a beautiful region, bordered by the Arkansas River, believes itself to be a coming center of great industrial interests. Already famous as the terminus of one celebrated railroad, it expects soon to be the meeting point of others, and to gather there much trade. Meanwhile it contains every facility for comfortable and luxurious living, and prides itself upon keeping abreast of the latest civilization. On the very borders of the Indian Territory, in its earlier days it was the depot of supplies for that vast reservation, and although its importance in that regard disappeared with the advent of the railroad which traverses the Territory itself, it still retains the United States court having jurisdiction over that region. Whatever crime against national law may be committed in a tract extending westward 150 miles and embracing a belt of country 200 miles wide, is tried in this court, and accordingly whatever arrest is made by a United States officer among its 60,000 inhabitants, the criminal is brought to this place. It is easy to understand that the court is overloaded with business and its prison with criminals. The industrious and painstaking judge who sits on this bench is occupied, according to a recent statement of Mr. Garland, two hundred and ninety-seven days in the year, but the cases brought before him must still wait weeks and months for trial, so overburdened is the court. The jail is as full as the docket. Technically this place of detention is a jail, but though not a penitentiary, it partakes in some respects of the nature of a prison, as will be seen. Its population is most heterogeneous. Here come men of all ages, accused of the gravest crimes or of the most trifling offenses. Here they await trial and here, in many cases, they suffer punishment; a difficult situation needing most careful attention and most skillful arrangement, it would be said. What, then, has the United States done to supply the need? How is the prison arranged and situated? What system is employed?

The student of prisons and criminals must be particularly interested in this prison, so exceptional in its necessities and so unlimited in the opportunity for the best appliances and regulations.

The United States prison at Fort Smith consists of two rooms in the cellar of the Government building, with no light except what comes from underground windows and no outside ventilation. In these two rooms were confined during the month of June, in this year, one hundred and nine prisoners; nine of them accused of murder, and two already convicted of that crime. This is the whole of the prison!

A fuller description of this extraordinary place, this piece of mediæval barbarity, only makes the horror worse. The Government building is a relic of the old military post, occupied as such until within twenty years. It is a large, low Southern house, once the quarters of the commandant of the post, built of brick with stone foundations and surrounded by wide verandas. Its rooms are used by the court and for similar purposes, and its cellar is the United States jail. The brick partition which supports the upper stories is the sole and only division contained in this remarkable prison. Each of the rooms thus made, or cells as they are called, is 55 feet long and 29 feet broad. Their height from floor to ceiling is at the utmost 7 feet. The small windows which light this black hole are at each end under the wide verandas. At one end of the jail the guard-room is located in front of them, but these windows are larger than those at the opposite end in the other room, being fully 6 feet by 3. Of course the solid partition between the two rooms prevents any draught. The climate at Fort Smith is that of interior Arkansas, a long, hot, dry summer, with the close atmosphere of a valley among low hills, without the Gulf breezes and lacking the strong winds of the open prairie. In early June the days were already stifling with heat, and the nights were only relieved by a warm breeze that blew off the river across the localities most favorably situated. The amount of such a breeze which would penetrate under the wide verandas of a Southern house into a crowded cellar can be easily reckoned. Hoping to make the air more bearable, the flag-stones of the floor are constantly wet down, and the noisome air is heavy with the rising steam and dampness.

Into these reeking holes are crowded criminals of every age and degree. The court has jurisdiction over all crimes committed between the white men on the reservation, against white men by Indians, against Indians by white men under certain conditions, and over all infringements of United States laws. Its prisoners are some of them full-blooded Indians, wild with all their savage passions and filthy beyond any Eastern conception; some are border ruffians who have lost none of their villainy, or their loathsomeness is losing the picturesqueness of a past day; some are the low-lived, mean, and sneaking population who hover on the borders of this neutral country; some are hardened criminals of the worst type who have fled from the law of the "States" to seek refuge in the wilds of the Indian country; some are innocent boys brought here for a trifling theft; young men who, in a moment's rage, have broken the public peace; respectable tradesmen who have unwittingly infringed some stringent United States regulation about arms or liquor; innocent citizens accused by some revengeful neighbor and awaiting trial; outcasts whose crimes are beyond the possibility of mention; murderers who have been caught, not in their first, but in their fifth or seventh murder. It is literally true that at Fort Smith all these persons are confined in the same room, the close, unventilated, wretched place already described. Nor are the prisoners limited to those awaiting trial. In the midst of the desperadoes, the villains, and the murderers are all those criminals already sentenced whose terms do not exceed a single year. Those sentenced to a longer term are sent to Michigan. Happy the convict whose crime is large, in the Indian Territory, for worse is a single year of Fort Smith than a cycle of Detroit!

Men who have been already convicted of murder are confined with the rest. There is absolutely nothing to hinder their free communication with their fellows. Five men are hanged at once in Fort Smith sometimes. At present there are nine men accused of murder in these two rooms, free to influence their companions, and, like all the rest of their associates, without the slightest check upon their opportunity to teach their horrid lore to young and old. The laws of the United States in regard to Indian reservations are very strict. No liquors may be sold in them, for instance, or carried there for sale, or given away. The temptation to break this regulation seems almost irresistible, by reason of the enormous profits resulting from such illicit trading, and often it happens that the man breaking this law is as young in years as in crime. Lads who have committed small thefts are also in this prison to-day, side by side with men under indictment for the most dastardly outrages known to justice. The average number in confinement is seventy-eight, and in June of this year, as has been said, the number had risen to one hundred and nine.

The only opportunity for washing given to this multitude of men is the single sink in each cell. There are no baths; only now and then some more fortunate prisoner is allowed the use of a coal-oil barrel sawed in two, this primitive wash-tub being the best that is afforded by the Government to this institution. The perplexed officials have tried many expedients to relieve the foulness of the place. The single bucket which serves the convenience of this considerable population is placed in a closet in the chimney, that the odors may be carried off through the only method of ventilation known to this jail. The prisoners spend their time as suits themselves. No work is possible. To relieve the tedium of the slow days a mock court is held and men are tried for such offenses as spitting upon the floor, and, on conviction, are sentenced to sweep it. Recently one poor wretch suffered such an accumulation of sentences of this nature that he appealed to the court upstairs. The wooden cots and blankets which constitute the beds are put one side during the day, or serve as seats. When feeding-time comes the rations are pushed through a slide in the door, and one after another these miserable beings retire to some corner like dogs to eat their portion. In the matter of exercise a regular routine is kept up. The prisoners divide themselves into squads, which march up and down the room at intervals; but be their stay there long or short, they see no ray of sunlight, they breathe no single breath of outside air.

This dark, crowded, underground hole is noisome with odors of every description, dirty beyond description, horrible with all horrors—a veritable hell upon earth. What must it be for the sick? Impossible as it seems to credit the fact, the sick and the wounded must live in these same rooms! There is no other provision for them, there is no other place where they can be put. There is "no refuge from the wild and ungovernable men around them," no relief from the close air, the eating and drinking and sleeping. It completes the picture to remember that small-pox is a disease very common to the Indian.

It should be made evident that for this state of things the people of Fort Smith are in no way responsible. It is a United States prison, and they have no more control over it than they have over the Capitol at Washington. They would welcome any attempt on the part of the Government to remove this plague spot and substitute a suitable and decent jail. Nor are the officers to be charged with neglect or blindness. They do all that in them lies to remedy the evils; they make the best of the matter with no little thought and labor and painstaking. But here are the prisoners and here are the accommodations provided for them by the United States Government.

There is no question, shameful though the conclusion be, where the blame lies. The worst fact in the whole disgraceful series is the fact that the National Government knows all about this horror. It can not even plead ignorance, for the report of the United States marshal in October, 1884, to the Department of Justice* contains a full statement of the matter, with all the particulars, the statistics, and a diagram of the prison. What was done about it? In June, 1885, nothing had been done about it. There was no lack of money in the United States Treasury, for we had changed administrations on the ground of a surplus, and at this very town the Government was just then selling the three hundred acres which surrounded the original fort. There was no lack of facilities, for Fort Smith is large and well-equipped, and situated on a great railway, and the officers for its court are able and distinguished. There was no lack of knowledge on the subject in a country which possesses such experts as Brinkerhoff, and Brockway, and Wayland, and a score of others like them, and in which prison conferences are annual occurrences.

What excuse has the Government of the United States to offer for the existence and continuance of this scandal?

I do not care to consume any further time at present, but will answer any question that any gentleman may desire to put.

Mr. BEACH. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROGERS] has made a very strong argument in favor of the construction of a jail at the place referred to, but I would like to hear why there should be a new post-office and court-house there. I would like to know what population the place has, what the Government revenues are at that point, and what the Government at the present time is paying for post-office and court accommodations.

Mr. ROGERS. I will answer the gentleman in the first place by saying that the post-office at the present time is not in a proper building. You can not rent a suitable building there in a central and convenient locality for a post-office for less than $1,000. What was the gentleman's other question?

Mr. BEACH. I would like to know the population of the place.

Mr. ROGERS. The population in 1880 was a little over 3,000; but the committee find from the testimony before it that the population has now reached about 8,000. Indeed, I think it is more than that. Since 1880, when the census was taken, we have constructed gas-works, water-works, street railways, and made various other improvements. Indeed, I know of no town in the South that is growing more rapidly than this little place.

Mr. BEACH. Then, if I understand my friend from Arkansas, he proposes that we spend $125,000 for the construction of a court-house and post-office in a place that, according to the census of 1880, had only 3,000 population.

* Report Attorney-General, 1884, page 143.

Mr. ROGERS. It has increased to 8,000.

Mr. BEACH. Well, even a population of 8,000, it seems to me, does not justify the expenditure of so large a sum of money. If we proceed in this way to erect public buildings of this expensive character wherever there is a population of 8,000, I do not think even the large amount of money in the Treasury to-day will meet the demand.

Mr. ROGERS. What in the world has the population of the town to do with the question of the necessity for suitable buildings if the facts stated are true? The Government must hold the court and provide for its officers and safely keep the prisoners; the necessity for suitable buildings exists, even if there were no post-office and no town, if the court is to be held there in the future.

Mr. BEACH. I look, Mr. Speaker, at the matter from a business standpoint. If the Government is paying a large amount of rent it may be more economical to erect a public building. These facts should be furnished to the House before any bills of this character are allowed to pass. We should know exactly how much the Government is paying out, and look at it, as I have said, in a business way, and not make large appropriations simply because it is asked for on the part of some member of the House. If we do look at it in a business way we will find, I fear, that a large number of the bills reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds after consideration before the House will fail of passage.

Mr. ROGERS's motion was agreed to, two-thirds having voted in favor thereof; and the rules were accordingly suspended, and the bill passed.

Mr. EDEN. I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. BLAND. I hope that motion will not prevail, as I wish to make a favorable report.

The SPEAKER. The noes seem to have it.

Mr. HOLMAN. I demand a division.

The House divided; and were—ayes 61, noes 73.

So the House refused to adjourn.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. STEELE. I move to suspend the rules that the Committee on Military Affairs may report back and pass the bill (H. R. 5836) providing for an assistant Secretary of War.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, an officer to be called the Assistant Secretary of War, whose salary shall be $5,000 per annum, and who shall perform all such duties in the War Department as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of War, or as may be required by law, and who shall act as Secretary of War in the absence of that officer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the motion is to suspend the rules and report the bill from the Committee on Military Affairs and pass the same.

Mr. STEELE. That is the motion I submit.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. REED, of Maine. Let us have a second.

Mr. STEELE. I ask by unanimous consent that the second be considered as ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think we had better have a count of the House

Mr. STEELE. Very well.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. STEELE were appointed as tellers.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes not counted.

So (two-thirds not voting in the affirmative) the rules were not suspended and the bill was not passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to debate it, and I suppose it goes over.

The SPEAKER. The bill remains in the Committee on Military Affairs.

SOLDIERS AND SAILORS OF THE MEXICAN WAR.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I move to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 807) granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war as amended by the Committee on Pensions, and pass the same.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the names of all the surviving officers, soldiers, and sailors who enlisted and served in the war with Mexico for any period during the years 1845, 1846, 1847, and 1848, and were honorably discharged, and their surviving widows, on the pension-roll, at the rate of $8 per month, from and after the passage of this act, during their lives.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry this act into effect: Provided, That where it shall appear that a discharge is lost, secondary evidence may be permitted; and where it shall appear an applicant has received a land-warrant, that shall be sufficient evidence of an honorable discharge, unless the evidence shows that he procured it by fraud.

The amendment of the committee was:

Add the following proviso:

"And provided further, That this act shall not apply to persons under political disabilities."

Mr. BAYNE. I demand a second.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I ask the second be considered as demanded.

Objection was made.

The SPEAKER appointed as tellers Mr. BAYNE and Mr. ELDREDGE.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 145, noes 11.

Mr. BAYNE. No quorum.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 162, noes 13.

So the motion to suspend the rules was seconded.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules thirty minutes are allowed for debate, fifteen in support and fifteen against it. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ELDREDGE] in control of the time in support of the motion and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BAYNE] in control of the time in opposition to it.

Mr. ELDREDGE. Unless there is some gentleman desiring to speak in opposition to the bill, I have nothing to say.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Michigan who proposes this bill whether it repeals section 4716 of the Revised Statutes so far as that section applies to Mexican soldiers and sailors?

Mr. ELDREDGE. It does not.

Mr. MCKINLEY. The gentleman is no doubt familiar with that section. I listened attentively to the reading of the bill, and I understood it applied to all Mexican soldiers except such as were under political disability.

Mr. ELDREDGE. That is a fact.

Mr. MCKINLEY. If that is the only exception, it occurs to me it does repeal section 4716 as to the Mexican soldiers save those under political disabilities.

A MEMBER. What is the section?

Mr. MCKINLEY. It is as follows:

SEC. 4716. No money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person, who in any manner voluntarily engaged in, or aided or abetted, the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Do I understand the gentleman to say that this bill does not repeal that section of the statutes?

Mr. ELDREDGE. It does not.

Mr. MCKINLEY. I think it does.

Mr. MORRISON. Of course it repeals it in part; it is intended to repeal it to the extent of allowing or granting a pension to all who served in the Mexican war and whose political disabilities have been removed.

Mr. ELDREDGE. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Speaker, the section of the statute read by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY] is one that applies to pensions generally. This bill, however, as I understand it, and as I think the House understands it, provides a service pension for the soldiers of the Mexican war. The provision of the general law in question is in relation to pensions granted for disability.

Now, so far as pensioning the soldiers of the Mexican war for service is concerned, the effect of that statute is repealed; but so far as repealing any pension for a disability is concerned, it can not be said by anybody that there is a line or a letter in this bill that can be construed in any such light as that. Because if the repeal obtains at all it will be by implication only. There is no express provision in the bill which would warrant such a construction.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Let me ask the gentleman if this pension proposed to be granted now is in addition to the pension already being drawn?

Mr. MATSON. No; I will answer the gentleman from Maine; this is a mere pension for service. If already pensioned for disability this would not apply.

Mr. REED, of Maine. But if a man has his pension for wounds or disabilities incurred in the Mexican war, does he not receive an additional pension under the provisions of this bill?

Mr. MATSON. He does not; at least I presume such is the construction. As to that, I will have to submit the question to the gentleman from Michigan, the chairman of the Committee on Pensions, who reports the bill. But as I understand it, it does not.

There is one thing I wish to say for the information of the House as well as the gentleman from Ohio, that there is nothing in this that repeals a pension for disabilities granted to any Mexican soldier.

Mr. LONG. What is the estimated cost of this bill?

Mr. MATSON. That I must submit to the chairman of the committee for answer, as he has investigated the subject.

Mr. ELDREDGE. It is estimated that it will cost about $4,000,000 at first; but this amount will be constantly reduced.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I hope the gentleman in charge of the bill will give us the information as to whether this bill will have the effect of giving two pensions to those who are now drawing pensions for disability. It is important that the House should have this information.

Mr. MORRISON. It gives a pension of $8 a month to every surviving soldier of the Mexican war, but no soldier can have two pensions.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I hope there will be some authoritative explanation as to the effect of the bill.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. If the gentleman from Michigan will give me his attention for a moment: The gentleman from Maine asks if a Mexican soldier is now receiving a pension for disabilities incurred in the Mexican war would he, under the operation of this bill, receive an additional pension for service?

Mr. ELDREDGE. He would not receive it.

Mr. MATSON. Upon the proposition as to whether an additional pension is granted by this act or not, I desired to say a moment ago, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio, that at the last session of Congress a law was enacted providing that no man should be permitted to draw two pensions at the same time.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But here is a law which, if passed, is subsequent to that, and does it not by implication at least repeal the former law?

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE, of Arkansas. The chairman of the committee, who has given the subject consideration, states that it will not have that effect.

Mr. HISCOCK. But this is the later act, and would not that be construed as the effect of it?

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman from Michigan has stated that it has no such effect.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. But it repeals the preceding law by implication.

Mr. HISCOCK. Let me ask the gentleman from Arkansas: Do you think it would have any such effect?

Mr. ROGERS. I have not examined the subject myself.

Mr. HISCOCK. Then I ask the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions: Have you any doubt but that the passage of this act would be construed as a repeal of the former law?

Mr. MATSON. If the gentleman from New York addresses his question to me, I have no doubt upon the subject myself. This is a bill to grant a service pension to the soldiers of the Mexican war, and that only; and under the law as it now exists, no man can draw two pensions. Hence it would not have the effect of permitting the additional pension to be drawn.

Mr. HISCOCK. You have pensions now for disability. Now, does this repeal the pension for disability if it grants the service pension?

Mr. MATSON. It does not.

Mr. MILLS. The general rule is that, while under the existing law no man can draw two pensions, if a special law is passed granting a pension—by special act—that would not in any manner repeal the general law prohibiting the drawing of two pensions.

Mr. CUTCHEON. But this is not a special law; and being the latest law, it will repeal all laws in conflict with it as to the entire class to which it applies.

Mr. MILLS. No, sir; not if it is a special law confined to a special kind of case.

Mr. MATSON. In the first place, the law does not repeal by implication.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON]. If a soldier is already drawing a pension for disability under existing laws and you pass a law that provides for a service pension, have you any doubt that that will give him two pensions?

Mr. MATSON. In view of the law which prohibits the drawing of two pensions I have no doubt but he will draw only one. If he was pensioned $8 for disability, and this bill became law, he would have the right to make an election which pension he would receive.

Mr. MCCOMAS. I would like to ask one further question of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] or the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ELDREDGE]. This bill provides for the pensioning of any soldier who has been in the service for any period. That might be half a day or an hour. Now is not that almost too short a time for a service-pension? The bill does not fix fourteen days or any period. A man might have entered the service and been discharged within the next half hour.

Mr. ELDREDGE. The gentleman can read the bill and he can understand it as well as I can. It does not provide any particular length of service, but treats all alike.

Mr. MCCOMAS. What is meant by "any period?" Is not that too loose and uncertain an expression?

Mr. ELDREDGE. To my idea it is not. I think a man who went into the Mexican war is entitled to a pension. There may have been a few men who went into the war for a shorter time than fourteen days, but perhaps not a dozen of them are now living.

Mr. MCCOMAS. And the bill does not require that during any moment of the period in which the man shall have been engaged in the war he should be on Mexican soil. I am in favor of a good bill for pensioning the soldiers of the Mexican war, but I do not want to vote loosely for pensions to anybody for service anywhere.

Mr. BRUMM. As I understand, this bill does not grant accumulating pensions?

Mr. ELDREDGE. No, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. This bill allows a service pension of $8 a month. Now, if a soldier is receiving less than $8 could he receive the pension under this bill?

Mr. ELDREDGE. He could elect which pension he would draw. If there is a Mexican soldier now drawing a pension at a less rate than $8 and he chooses still to draw that he can do it, but is not compelled to do so.

Mr. BRUMM. What provision of the bill guarantees that?

Mr. BRADY. I will state for the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania and for the committee that there is a general law, and under that law the pensioner can elect which pension he shall receive, but under the present law governing pensions no man can draw two pensions at the same time.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I am thankful to the gentleman from Michigan for his kindness in yielding me a few minutes of the short time allowed for the discussion of this important measure. In that brief time no one can set forth one tithe of the merit of a measure intended to grant pensions to the soldiers who fought the battles of the Mexican war and to their widows. Nor will it be possible to recount one hundredth part of their glorious achievements. But, sir, I will strive to answer one or two of the objections made to this measure.

The question has been asked whether it would not be possible for a person to draw two pensions under this bill when he is already pensioned for disability. At the last Congress, it will be remembered by those who were here, we passed an act providing that in no instance could a person receive two pensions. This bill does not repeal that law in express terms, and it could not be held to repeal it by implication in view of the contemporaneous discussion here, which in doubtful cases is always an element in construing acts of Congress or of other legislative assemblies. For it will be remembered that the author of the bill and others advocating it have said all along that it was not the intention to grant double pensions. Sir, how is it we can hesitate to grant this pension? Forty years after the service was rendered we are called upon to do some small measure of justice to the men who rendered the service in the Mexican war, and can we refuse? Only the other day this House passed a bill granting, not $8 a month, as provided in the bill, but $12, to widows of soldiers of other wars. Will it hesitate now to grant $8 to the soldiers of the war with Mexico? It seems to me every principle of justice will sustain us in making this long-refused act of recompense to those who almost doubled the territory of the United States, or that portion of it which was embraced in the original colonies.

Mr. Speaker, it has been asked how much money would be required to meet the requirements of this bill if it should become a law. It will be remembered this House did not hesitate a few days ago to pass a bill which entailed from six to ten millions of dollars' additional expense on the Pension Department. A gentleman who has called on the Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. ELDREDGE, says, on the best evidence he can get, this will only require $4,000,000 per annum. It must be remembered that those who were in that war are now in old age.

Mr. MORRISON. Not by a good deal. [Laughter.]

Mr. McMILLIN. And their number will rapidly diminish as time advances. My friend from Illinois says humorously they are not old. I know that in faithful friendships, devotion to principle, and love of country they are young as when they crossed the burning border of the Mexican States. But the gray hairs in their venerable heads tell the story of how age is advancing and toil wearing them.

Where is the man so devoid of patriotism that his heart does not beat with patriotic pride when he thinks of their deeds of valor? In the springtime of life they left home, country, and loved ones and took up their line of march over burning sands and beneath scorching skies to battle for the extension of our boundaries and the glory of our flag. How well they fought, how bravely fell, I have not time to tell. No pension we can give will adequately compensate for their sacrifices and their sufferings or add one laurel to their brow. Of those who fell it has been truly said by the eloquent O'Hara:

> On fame's eternal camping ground
> Their silent tents are spread,
> And Glory guards with solemn sound
> The bivouac of the dead.

But, Mr. Speaker, there is one thing we can do; we can show our gratitude by doing justice to them, and by so doing we will honor ourselves and the age in which we live.

We can take many of those valiant sons from the poor-houses of the country, and thereby show that we are not ingrates, and thereby relieve the military servants of the Government of that poverty into which many of them have been cast by the very service that we now seek to compensate.

Mr. REED, of Maine. I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee a question.

Mr. McMILLIN. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] desires to ask me a question. I yield to him.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. I wish to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether he does not think this bill should be confined to soldiers who served in Mexico?

Mr. McMILLIN. Sir, there are changes I would make to the bill. I introduced one myself at the beginning of the session which I prefer to this. But under our rules we can not annul this one now or substitute another for it. When I am, therefore, required to vote for or against this, I do not hesitate to support it rather than oppose so meritorious a class of citizens.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ELDRIDGE] has only two minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. McMILLIN. Then I can not occupy more of the time of the gentleman from Michigan and yield, thanking him again for his courtesy and the House for its attention. I would be pleased to answer the question of the gentleman from Maine if I had any time left.

Mr. HISCOCK. I ask the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ELDREDGE] if he will accept this amendment:

Provided further, That no pension shall be allowed under this act to a person receiving a pension for a disability unless such person resigns the pension for disability.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. ELDREDGE] yield?

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have reserved the balance of my time.

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE].

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, if this bill does not contemplate duplicate pensions it is radically wrong. Suppose a Mexican-war soldier was wounded or incurred disability in that war and he is on the pension-roll at $2 or $4 a month, if it be true that this bill does not put him on the pension-roll at $8 a month you do that man injustice. The chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions says that this bill does not contemplate duplicate pensions, that a man now receiving a pension can not under this act receive an additional one. Therefore you put on the pension-roll at $4 a month a man who has incurred a disability in the service, and at the same time you put on the pension-roll at $8 a month a man who has incurred no disability.

Mr. MATSON. Will my colleague yield for a suggestion?

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I have only three minutes.

Mr. MATSON. I simply wished to suggest to my colleague that under the law the soldier has a right to elect which pension he will take.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I say that if this bill does not in terms grant a duplicate pension it is radically wrong so far as that case is concerned. Take another case: Suppose a man was in the service in the Mexican war and was subsequently in the service of the United States in the war of the rebellion; suppose he incurred a disability in the latter war for which he has a service pension of $2, $4, or $6 a month; it is insisted that the soldier gets nothing whatever for his service in the Mexican war, and he can not get anything unless his pension is duplicated.

But, Mr. Speaker, my chief objection to this measure is not that it provides a service pension, but that it does so unjustly. There never was any sense or logic in giving a man who served only five, or six, or ten, or fourteen days the same amount of service pension you give to a man who served a year or more. This bill gives pensions to men who never left the States in which they were rendezvoused. By this bill men who were never even en route to Mexico receive pensions equal to the pensions you give men who were in the army of invasion and fought in all the battles. If you would pass a service pension graduated according to the amount of service performed there would be some sense in it.

But I object again, Mr. Speaker, because the records of the War Department disclose the fact that subsequent to the 14th of September, 1847, when the last hostile gun was fired in the Mexican war, forty thousand, or nearly forty thousand, enlistments were made. I undertake to say that at least twenty-five thousand of those men never even marched in the direction of the front, and it is to bring contempt and contumely upon the whole business of pensions to put on that honorable roll, alongside of the soldiers who were wounded and maimed and disabled and disfigured in their country's service, a class of men who did not perform any military service at all.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes of my time to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON].

Mr. CUTCHEON. Mr. Speaker, I am anxious to vote for a Mexican pension bill, but I can not see my way clear to vote for this Mexican pension bill. It gives a service pension without any service whatever. It is a bill to grant a pension to men neither for service, for wounds, for disability, for age, nor for any other consideration that is recognized by any law as a ground for a pension. I can not vote for this bill because of its indefiniteness. As the gentleman who has just taken his seat has said, it does not require that a man should have even set his face in the direction of Mexico. It not only does not require that he should have heard a hostile gun in that war, but he need not have been within 2,000 miles of a hostile gun. There is no limitation of age in the bill; there is no limitation of disability; there is no limitation in it that ought to be in a pension bill of any kind whatsoever. As the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] has remarked, we bring discredit upon the entire pension policy when we grant pensions in this loose and unlimited way. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I shall be compelled reluctantly to cast my vote against this bill, but I hope that another Mexican pension bill may be brought in here more definite and guarded in its terms, a bill for which we can all vote.

So far as regards the repeal of the clause forbidding the payment of pensions to those who have been in the confederate service, I have no objection to that. I am willing to waive that matter. If men who did good service to their country in the Mexican war were afterward swept into the maelstrom of rebellion by the dominant sentiment of their section, I am willing to remember the good they did in the days of their young manhood and forgive them the wrong that they committed in later years. I do not object to this bill upon that ground. But I do object to it upon the ground that it is contrary to every principle of our pension legislation to grant pensions without any limitation as to time, without any limitation as to service, without any limitation as to disability, without any limitation as to age.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAYNE. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, this bill changes the grounds of a pension from disability to service. Soldiers of the Mexican war, like those who served in the war for the Union, are now entitled to pensions for disability; indeed this bill proposes not only to change the basis of pensions from disability to service, but actually, as my friend from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] has just remarked, proposes to grant pensions for no service at all; and not only that, but to grant the same pension for no service at all as for service all through the Mexican war.

Under this bill the man who never left the camp of his enlistment is to be allowed the same pension as the soldier who fought the desperate battle of Buena Vista under Taylor or participated in the charge at Chapultepec and was wounded and disabled. This is monstrous injustice. Such a proposition, in my judgment, ought not to receive the vote of a single member on this floor, and deserves only to be scouted out of the House. Again, Mr. Speaker, if a man who merely enlisted in the Mexican war is entitled to a pension for enlistment only, I want to know why the million of Union soldiers now living who not only enlisted but served one, two, or three years, participating in battle after battle and incurring all the hardships of actual war, are not entitled to pensions for that service. If it were permissible under the rules, I would now move an amendment to this bill so as to include in it all Union soldiers who served in the late war. If one is entitled to service pensions the other is.

Let us stand on some principle. Some gentleman suggests that a soldier of the Mexican war must probably be now sixty years of age. If age is to be the ground of pension, that is another thing. But is not a man who served in the late war and is now sixty as much entitled to a pension as one who served in the Mexican war and is only sixty? If pensions are to be given for service, then equal service should entitle men to equal pensions. If for age, then to all on arriving at the same age. We can not depart from safe principles and escape the legitimate consequences; and the consequences of this bill, let me tell this House, will be to open the Treasury doors to an expenditure reaching to thousands of millions of dollars before it ends.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAYNE. I yield one minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS].

Mr. MCCOMAS. Mr. Speaker, on the present pension-roll, as appears by the report of Commissioner Black, there are 244,000 persons, and of these 132,000 receive a smaller amount of pension than this bill proposes to give to every soldier of the Mexican war. These 132,000 persons receive on account of disability less than $8 a month; 90,000 persons on the present roll get less than $4 a month, though they may have served in many battles, and 27,000 get from $2 a month down to $1 for actual service. I would vote for a properly framed bill to pension soldiers of the Mexican war. I did vote for such a bill in the last Congress, but I can not vote for a measure which discriminates against the soldiers of the late war, many of whom served four years, participating in many battles. I can not vote to give for no service a greater pension than is now allowed to many of the soldiers of the late war, suffering under disability contracted in actual service.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection whatever to pensioning by any proper bill the soldiers of the Mexican war. Every man who served in the Mexican war and who at this time needs the aid of this Government shall have my vote to secure to him a pension. But I believe the whole theory and principle of this bill are hostile to our established policy in regard to pensioning the soldiers of the Government. The bill proposes to pension whole regiments of men who never saw a battlefield; men who simply enlisted in the service and who went through the form of being mustered in, but who never shouldered a musket, or at least never fired a cartridge in the Mexican war. It proposes to pension certain classes of men who have an accumulation of property and do not need this aid from the Government.

Numbers of the men who served in that war have all the means that they require. Yet this bill contemplates paying to these men a pension of $8 a month, though they may not have served a week or ten days in the Mexican war. It is proposed to do this when there are now in the poor-houses many indigent soldiers of the late war—more than 700 of whom are living on the bounty or charity of the State of Pennsylvania because they can not now get a pension from the Government. Yet the soldiers of the Mexican war, most of whom do not seek this gratuity, because they are not in indigent circumstances, are to receive under this bill a pension whether they be poor or rich, while others who served their country and are now in impoverished circumstances are to be denied the same bounty.

Let us frame and pass a pension bill which will embrace those who are in indigent circumstances, whether they served in the Mexican war or in the war for the suppression of the rebellion. Let us vote the bounty of the Government in that direction, but let us not vote to pay from fifteen to twenty million dollars a year to men most of whom do not need the money. When we undertake to carry out the pension system on that principle we are squandering the public money and are doing a gross injustice to the men who really served their country faithfully and who earned a pension in consequence of having contracted disease or disability in the military service.

I think, sir, this bill has not been well considered. I do not think it underwent the scrutiny of gentlemen who desire to put a pension on the real merits of the case, because if it had they would have drawn a line between those who had rendered actual service and those who only enlisted and never fired a gun anywhere, drew a sword anywhere, or lifted a hand during the war with Mexico. There were, I understand, probably thirty regiments which were mustered into the service near the close of the Mexican war which never left the States, never entered Mexican territory, and yet this scheme would give each one of such soldiers $8 per month, when thousands of the Union soldiers of the late war who have been found to have pensionable disabilities are getting but $2 to $4 per month.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ELDREDGE. I have only two minutes remaining, and I will yield that to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. WOLFORD. Mr. Speaker, the object of the opposition to this bill, and gentlemen can not deceive the country, is because there are some men who live in a section of the country where you do not who will get the advantage if it should pass. The people will not be deceived, and they will put the opposition on its proper ground.

It is alleged this is purely a service pension. So it is, but we must not forget that this is not a new thing in the history of this Government. A service pension was given to the soldiers of the Revolutionary war, and a service pension was given to the soldiers of the war of 1812. We want to give a service pension at this time to the surviving soldiers and sailors of the Mexican war.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] would not vote for a service pension for anybody. Much as he talks about the Union soldier, he would not vote him a service pension. I would vote for a service pension to the Union soldier just as I propose to vote to give a service pension to those who won victory for us in the Mexican war. They deserve it at our hands. They gave the country more than a million of square miles of the richest land in the world, and they did it although the country paid them only the pitiful sum of $7 a month. I am for the Union soldier; but I go further—I would not only pension the Union soldier, but I would also pension the surviving Mexican soldiers; they not only fought for the country, but went upon foreign soil, leaving their families and homes, and won victory for us in a foreign land.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. In order to give members of the House further opportunity to examine this question I move that the House do now adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 128, noes 44.

Mr. MCRAE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused, 22 only voting in favor thereof.

So the motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk, under the rule, and referred as follows:

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present nine petitions of citizens of Walton and Washington Counties, in West Florida, praying for the passage of the bill introduced by me to revoke the grant of lands made to the State of Florida in 1856. This petition comes to me from respectable sources and purports to be signed by nearly the entire population of those counties. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present the petition of the town council of the town of Tampa, Fla., signed by the president of the council and under the seal of the town council. The petition prays for the passage of an act for the location of certain pieces of Girard scrip upon tracts of land bordering on the limits of the town of Tampa known as the Fort Brooke military reservation. It states that the town of Tampa is interested in the location of this scrip and the issuance of patents thereunder; that the offering of said land at public sale or the entry thereof under the settlement laws would probably place the title in the hands of speculators and prove a serious detriment to the best interests of the town, and whereas the said W. B. Henderson has agreed that in case he obtains a patent from the Government for said lands that he will convey to the family of the late Louis Le Bell their home on said lands where they have lived so many years, therefore the proceedings of the council show that an agreement has been made by which the town is to receive such parts of it as are desired or useful to it, and that the president of the town council be directed to petition Congress in their name for such legislation as may be necessary to perfect title under said scrip location and to request their Senators and Representatives to urge and support the enactment of such a measure.

The petitioners pray for the location of such scrip under the authority of a special act of Congress.

In presenting the petition I wish to say, inasmuch as there have been very great misrepresentations in regard to myself and to others standing in official position here, as will be seen from the newspaper I shall refer to, that from the first period of my occupying a seat in this Chamber, seven years ago, I did in conformity with a petition sent from the town of Tampa introduce into this body and advocate the passage of a bill, and a favorable report of the Committee on Public Lands, donating this reservation to the town of Tampa. From that time to the present at every Congress I have introduced petitions and bills to that effect, and have persistently and continuously urged the favorable report of the bill and its passage by the Senate. Several persons who own and control newspaper interests adverse to the people and the State have for some time been engaged in publishing false and defamatory statements and criticisms in regard to me, to whom and their statements I shall at an early day ask the attention of the Senate and the people, and have made the Fort Brooke military reservation and my action in respect to it the subject of some of these defamations. The records of the Senate and the General Land Office and the testimony of the members of the Committee on Public Lands attest my earnest support of the donation of the land to the town, and the absolute falsehood of these statements to the contrary. The telegrams sent in my name were entirely proper, and in the interest of those who were seeking to secure the land against entry by strangers, as before that time 40 acres, I think, of it had been located with scrip and patented to a Mr. Charles Brush before any one in Tampa knew that it was subject to entry. I append hereto some letters and evidence from the General Land Office showing my action in the premises.

The entries upon the reservation, which had been made before I came into the Senate, have been set aside at my instance. All private entries from that time to the present have been set aside.

There have been various attempts made to locate this reservation, which is quite valuable, being immediately adjacent to the town of Tampa and almost necessary to the further extension of the town, by individuals under the homestead and pre-emption laws, and under scrip locations. I have at times been applied to to prevent the location by strangers and speculators without the knowledge of the people of Tampa or those directly interested. I have allowed at such times the attorneys of those who represented the interests of the people of Tampa and the citizens resident there to telegram in my name information of such proceedings, and in all instances this has been done with the knowledge of my opposition and that I should protest and ask to set aside such entries. In every case that has been done since I have been in the Senate, and at this session I had introduced and there was pending and under the consideration of a subcommittee of the Committee on Public Lands a bill to donate this land to the town of Tampa for educational and other purposes.

I desire to submit, as a part of the few remarks which I shall make on this occasion, a statement taken from the records of the General Land Office and other papers, which I will ask to have printed in the RECORD without delaying the Senate to hear it, in order that the people of that locality may know precisely the condition of this reservation and how it stands before the committee.

I wish to say further that the gentlemen who are proposing to locate this land for the benefit of the town are largely interested in the town of Tampa, are citizens of high character, and have, no doubt, the best interests of the town at heart. I understand that there has been an arrangement made between them and the town council of Tampa which is satisfactory to the authorities; but I am also advised that there is opposition on the part of some persons, and I am informed that the council and these gentlemen desire me to state that they wish the utmost publicity given to their action in this respect, and that those who have any opposition to it shall be heard before the Committee on Public Lands. They desire me to submit with the petition a bill, which I shall hereafter introduce, and the paper which I hold in my hand, the Tampa Guardian, being a representation on the part of some persons having opinions or interests adverse to the action of the town council, opposing it upon the ground that the reservation should be donated entirely and absolutely to the town at its will and discretion.

I therefore ask in connection with the petition that the newspaper sent to me, being the Tampa Guardian, containing certain statements in regard to it on the part of certain persons opposing this action of the town council, may be referred in like manner to the Committee on Public Lands:

The letters of Hon. John T. Lesley and Capt. James McKay, in reference to the Fort Brooke reservation, were placed in my hands by Senator CALL in 1882-'83, to select a suitable attorney to represent these gentlemen, according to their request. I selected Mr. John S. Tucker.

The telegrams, in question, were sent by persons representing the Tampa gentlemen. Senator CALL's opposition to their entries was communicated by me to the attorney, and has always been well known to all parties claiming interests in this reservation. Senator CALL has had no connection with any of these parties, but has always opposed all entries, both theirs and all others. I was at that time employed as a clerk of Senator Johnson's committee, and for that reason was frequently in Senator CALL's company, and being well acquainted in this city was asked by him to select an attorney for Mr. Lesley and others.

The facts in this matter are well known to me and to others, by whom they can be easily established.

H. B. LITTLEPAGE.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 24, 1886.

Having seen an article in a Florida newspaper charging Senator CALL with double dealing and collusion with parties in Tampa, in certain homestead and scrip locations made on the Fort Brooke reservation, I desire, in justice to Senator CALL, to make a statement of the facts within my knowledge in reference to the matter.

Senator CALL, in 1883, through Capt. H. B. Littlepage, of this city, placed in my hands letters from Hon. John T. Lesley and Capt. James McKay, of Tampa, in which he was requested to obtain an entry of this reservation for the town of Tampa, and, if this could not be done, then for certain gentleman citizens of that town; and that if it was not in his power to give them his personal aid and support that he would select a suitable attorney to represent them.

Senator CALL stated to me, through Captain Littlepage, and subsequently in person, that the writers of these letters were men of character and standing in their community, but that he was committed to the support of a bill for the donation of the land to the town of Tampa for educational and other purposes, and that he should oppose all private entries, as he had been doing, until otherwise instructed by the people of Tampa.

It is due to the Senator to say that he has always firmly and persistently maintained this position both in the Senate and before the General Land Office, and so far from being in collusion with the parties seeking to obtain these entries, I know that he has been their strongest opponent; but for him I am of opinion that these entries would have been confirmed, or at least some of them.

Very respectfully,

JNO. S. TUCKER, Attorney at Law.

UNITED STATES SENATE.

Washington, D. C., August 4, 1884.

I hereby state that I am a member of the Committee on Public Lands of the United States Senate, and that Senator CALL, of Florida, has repeatedly appeared before that committee during the past and previous sessions of Congress and urged the committee to report favorably a bill offered by him for the donation of the Fort Brooke reservation to the town of Tampa for public schools and parks and other purposes. Mr. CALL was quite urgent about this bill, but the committee could not find time in the press of other more important business to reach a satisfactory conclusion about it.

JOHN T. MORGAN,
United States Senate.

Statement relating to the Fort Brooke military reservation in Florida.

The Fort Brooke military reservation at Tampa, Fla., was originally established by executive order of December 10, 1830, covering an area of 16 miles square, and after various modifications and reductions the remainder, as it then stood, containing 148.11 acres, was duly relinquished in writing by the Secretary of War to the Secretary of the Interior January 4, 1883, under the act of August 18, 1856, and on the 17th of March, 1883, a subdivision plat of the relinquished tract was sent by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to the register and receiver at Gainesville, Fla. The plat was received at the local office March 22, 1883. On the same day Edmond S. Chew made homestead entry of said land, and on the 26th and 30th of the same month Clifford Herrick and Lewis Bell, respectively, filed declaratory statement for the same. On the 2d of April, 1883, the said Commissioner instructed the register and receiver by telegram to allow no entries upon any of the land.

Subsequently, in the same month, several parties applied to file on said tract, but their applications were rejected because of the Commissioner's instructions.

The several claimants were then invited to submit reasons why said tract should not be disposed of at public sale. After considering these reasons the Commissioner rendered decisions of date December 17, 1883, and January 22, 1884, to the effect that the land was not subject to entry, but that it was his duty to order it into market that it might be appraised and sold as the law contemplates and requires, and directed the entry and filings to be canceled.

The several parties then appealed from these decisions and filed briefs thereon, and in a lengthy opinion the decisions were affirmed by the Secretary of the Interior on May 16, 1884.

On June 14, 1884, a joint motion was filed by the attorneys for the several applicants for a review of the Departmental decision of May 16, 1884, which motion was denied May 21, 1885, the Secretary finding that "said decision appears to have been well considered, and a careful examination of the same fails to disclose any errors therein." (Decisions Department of the Interior, volume 2, pages 603 and 606, and volume 3, page 556.)

On November 27, 1883, William B. Henderson made application at the Gainesville, Fla., land office to locate upon the land, which was then public land, four 40-acre pieces of land certificates numbered as subdivisions 11, 12, 13, and 14, respectively, issued under "an act for the relief of the heirs of Joseph Gerard," approved February 10, 1855 (10 Stat., 849), which permits them "to enter, each one of them severally, or his or their heirs, one section of the public lands without the payment of any consideration," &c.

This application is now pending in the General Land Office, and was not before the Department nor considered in the decisions herein cited.

The application to locate said scrip was in the interest of the citizens of the town of Tampa, and the expense attending its purchase and location has exceeded $17,000. The town council of Tampa have petitioned Congress to authorize the location of this scrip, and in view of the fact that Congress by act of July 23, 1848, gave a quarter-section of the same reservation to the town of Hillsborough it is believed that the petition should be granted, independent of the fact that the right to said land under the application named would seem to be beyond dispute or question.

Congress has frequently passed acts of this character, and among others the act of January 21, 1885 (public act No. 15), which permitted Charles Popper to make a private entry of certain lands in the Camp Douglas military reservation in the Territory of Utah.

Finally, it is suggested that the bill in question is intended to perfect the only proper application under existing laws now pending for the land for the reason that all other applications have been rejected by the Department of the Interior.

WM. B. HENDERSON.

To Hon. WILKINSON CALL,
United States Senate.

The people should resent the wrongs perpetrated—The sentiment of the people—The ring's last struggle—The methods used—Scene in the council chamber—Reports and resolutions, how adopted—Councilman Knight's absence—The yeas and nays.

All will agree that the Fort Brooke reservation question is one of the most vexed in which the interests of Tampa have ever been complicated. In order to present the matter properly before our readers we will review the matter back a few years. In the month of January, 1883, the War Department abandoned Fort Brooke as a military post and turned the same over to the Interior Department. By this action it was understood by many that this land, embracing a fraction over 148 acres, was subject to homestead and pre-emption. By a letter at our command, written by Senator CALL, we learn that as soon as he ascertained the action of the War Department he telegraphed to Capt. John T. Lesley, at Tampa, the fact, and for him to homestead the reservation; he also states that a telegram was sent in his name to Dr. E. S. Carew and a Mr. Carlisle, at Gainesville where the local land office is located, to the same effect. Captain Lesley not being at home, failed to receive the telegram, as stated by him in a recent meeting of the town council, and the telegraph operator, who was in the employ of W. B. Henderson, took advantage of the information intended for Captain Lesley, and homesteaded the land. In the mean time Dr. E. S. Carew, having superior access to the land office, got out the necessary papers and within a few hours was a homesteader also, and occupies the land at this date. Other parties made claims and so the matter has stood until the Commissioner of the Land Office ruled that the land was not subject to homestead, and refused to recognize any such claim.

During the present session of Congress we believe that Senator CALL has introduced a bill donating this tract of land to the town of Tampa. By this action he represents the interests of our people, notwithstanding there are facts and statements in existence that clearly show to unprejudiced minds that the Senator's actions and efforts have not been consistent with this movement.

But now comes Messrs. J. T. Lesley and W. B. Henderson, who claim that they have invested in Gerard scrip to the amount of about $17,000 that they have placed (or desire to place) on this land, and in this connection we shall have to speak more fully.

About three months ago the Tampa Board of Trade began to agitate this question with a view to securing the reservation for the town to be used as a public park, its adaptability and desirability for this purpose being very favorable. About the same time the question was brought before the town council. Mr. Henderson, who is a member of the council, requested, as a personal favor, at one meeting when the subject was introduced, that the matter be deferred one month, when Captain Lesley desired to appear before the council and submit a proposition.

Action was postponed, but Captain Lesley did not appear, and we understand that the council adopted and sent a memorial to the Department, and to our Representatives in Congress, asking that a speedy settlement of the question be reached if possible.

LATER DEVELOPMENTS.

On the 9th instant a special meeting of the council was called. Captain Lesley appeared before it and submitted a proposition to the effect that if the council would indorse his scrip claim of $17,000 and give its influence in having a bill passed by Congress allowing said claim, he would bind himself to donate such portion of the reservation as might be agreed upon. Colonel Sparkman also appeared and advised the council to compromise. A committee was appointed to confer with Messrs. Henderson and Lesley, and to report the character of the arrangement that could be made. The council met again on the 11th, but the committee asked further time to report, and an adjournment to the 17th instant was made.

PROCEEDINGS.

Members present, W. T. Haskins, president, G. B. Sparkman, S. A. Jones, H. L. Branch, W. B. Henderson, Dr. J. P. Wall, T. E. Jackson, and T. C. Taliaferro.

The president excused Mr. Henderson from participation in the proceedings owing to his being an interested party in the question before the council.

The following report from the committee was submitted:

MAJORITY REPORT.

To the president and members of the town council of the town of Tampa:

We, the undersigned committee, who were appointed by your honorable body to confer with Messrs. Henderson and Lesley in reference to some concert of action in obtaining the military reservation, beg leave to submit the following report:

Whereas we have considered that the speedy settlement of this question is of paramount importance to the town from the representations of their attorneys; and

Whereas we believe that Messrs. Henderson and Lesley have vested legal rights in the reservation, and that the subjoined proposition agreed upon between these gentlemen and ourselves, as a committee, is a fair, reasonable, and liberal proposition for the town, and we recommend its adoption by the council.

The proposition as agreed upon is that Henderson and Lesley shall donate to the town a strip of the reservation, beginning at a point in the branch where it intersects the middle of Franklin street, running from thence in a direct line as a continuation of Franklin street, so as to take in the clump of live oaks lying to the westward of said line, to a point south of the house occupied by Dr. E. S. Carew, thence west at right angle with said line either to the east line of Tampa street, if that will include the trees before referred to, or if not, then to the middle of said Tampa street, thence north parallel to the first-mentioned line to the branch, thence up said branch to the point of beginning.

We further recommend that the land lying between this plot and the bay on the south be either donated to the town for hotel purposes, or be sold for that purpose by Messrs. Henderson and Lesley, and the proceeds be given to the town for such purposes as the town council may designate.

We further recommend that Franklin and Tampa streets be extended to the bay with width of 80 feet, except on each side of the park, on either side of which to be 50 feet.

We further recommend that Messrs. Henderson and Lesley enter into a written contract with the council conditioned to carry out the provisions of this agreement, and that the council pass a resolution requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to take such action as will enable Messrs. Henderson and Lesley to perfect their scrip location on said reservation.

G. B. SPARKMAN,
S. A. JONES.

A motion to lay the above report on the table was lost; Wall, Jackson, and Taliaferro voting in the affirmative; Sparkman, Jones, and Branch in the negative. The President decided in the negative.

Mr. T. E. Jackson, from the committee, then submitted the following:

MINORITY REPORT.

Mr. Chairman, and Gentlemen of the Town Council:

As a member of the committee appointed to confer with Messrs. Henderson and Lesley as to their proposition made to the council in regard to the Fort Brooke military reservation, I beg leave to submit a minority report. I differ with my colleagues as to what our report should consist of. I believe that it was merely the duty of this committee to ascertain and report the best arrangement for the interests of the town that could be effected with Messrs. Henderson and Lesley, who have clearly stated to us that they would, in the event of their securing this reservation, give to the town of Tampa, for the use of the town as a park and for hotel purposes, that portion of the reservation lying between a line drawn from the center of Franklin street to the bay, and a similar line drawn from the center of Tampa street to the bay, and bounded on the north by the little stream which runs through the reserve, and on the south by a public road which skirts the bay, with a street of 40 feet on the sides of said park, and his was the best they would do, and all this provided the town would assist them to get the remainder for themselves; and such a report I was willing to make to the council. I can not say that I believe Messrs. Henderson and Lesley have any legal rights to that reservation, for I do not so believe. Nor can I recommend to the town council a settlement of this matter, so far as the town is concerned, upon any such basis. And, furthermore, I very much doubt the wisdom and propriety of the town council entering into any bargain in this matter, for I must say that I do not put any faith in this scrip which has been mentioned, a number of legal minds to the contrary, among whom are all of the legal talent of this corporation.

Respectfully submitted.

THOMAS E. JACKSON,
Member of the Town Council and of the Committee on Reservation.

A motion to adopt the majority report carried, as follows: Sparkman, Branch, and Jones voting in the affirmative; Wall, Jackson, and Taliaferro voted in the negative. W. T. Haskins, president, decided in the affirmative.

The following resolution was then offered and adopted:

"Whereas W. B. Henderson has an application pending in the General Land Office at Washington, D. C., for the location in his name of certain pieces of Gerard scrip upon the following parts of land, viz: Lots 8, 9, and 10, of section 24, township 29 south, range 19 east, and lots 12, 13, and 14, of section 19, township 29 south, range 19 east, in the State of Florida; and

"Whereas the expenses attending the purchase and location of said scrip upon said lands aggregate nearly $17,500; and

"Whereas the town of Tampa is directly interested in the location of said scrip and in the issuance of a patent thereunder; and

"Whereas the offering of said land at public sale or the entry thereof under the settlement laws would probably place the title thereto in the hands of speculators, and thereby prove a serious detriment to the best interests of said town; and

"Whereas the said W. B. Henderson has agreed that in case he obtains a patent from the Government for said lands that he will convey to the family of Louis Le Bell their home on said lands, where they have lived so many years: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the president of the town council be directed to petition Congress in our name for such legislation as may be necessary to perfect title under said scrip location, and to request our Senators and Representatives to urge and support the execution of such a measure.

"Passed town council this 17th of February, 1886.

"WM. T. HASKINS, Pres. Council.

"Approved this 18th day of February, A. D. 1886.

"DUFF POST, Mayor."

On motion the resolution was adopted, Sparkman, Jones, and Branch voting yes; Wall, Jackson, and Taliaferro voting no. Haskins decided in the affirmative.

The following resolution was adopted during the meeting:

"Whereas Mr. S. M. Sparkman, the present attorney for the town of Tampa, and whereas he has been the attorney for Messrs. Henderson and Lesley in the Fort Brooke military reservation for several years, and whereas he requested the town council to designate some attorney to represent the town council in preparing a contract between Messrs. Henderson and Lesley, in reference to said reservation:

"Be it resolved, That Mr. S. M. Sparkman be requested to obtain the services of Messrs. Hammond & McFarlane to represent the town council in said business."

To a person unacquainted with the circumstances and inside facts of the above proceeding it may not look so bad, but when considered from an independent and searching standpoint, for downright chicanery, bossism, and misrepresentation there can hardly be a parallel in the country—certainly not in the history of Tampa. The scheme has been so ingeniously engineered that the true inwardness of the transaction has been generally concealed from the public. However we have faith that prompt and energetic measures can yet defeat this well-planned scheme to swindle the citizens of Tampa, and we hope by this article to so clearly portray the facts that the people will fully realize the enormity of the wrong that has been perpetrated already, and at this moment is being furthered. Blind and implicit confidence in the honor of men is the foundation for much of the imposition and fraud that is practiced all over this country.

There is no question but that the Fort Brooke reservation belongs to the Government at the present time, and that the Government can do what it pleases with it. It will also be conceded that the value of this land is enhanced owing to its location alongside the rapidly developing and promising city of Tampa. The Government is rich; it does not need the land; in many instances it has shown a liberal disposition in aiding the development of sections and towns, and there is no good cause to doubt its generosity in this instance. Why has this reservation not been donated to Tampa before now? Perhaps the principal reason is that it was never asked to do so until a few weeks ago. We have not explained to Congress what use we could make of it; no effort has been made to get it by the town. But just now, when the citizens have commenced action and petitioned Congress, and our Senator has introduced a bill in behalf of the town, the town council steps in, takes the bit in its unrighteous mouth, and barters away the town's claim and prospect, for what? About 5 acres of the 148, with the recommendation that the remainder be given to Capt. John T. Lesley and Mr. W. B. Henderson. But let us examine briefly this action of the council on the known facts. Why did not Captain Lesley meet the council at the time agreed about two months ago, when it was possible for all the members to be present? Why was it necessary to seek such a time when Councilman Knight was absent from the city to call a special meeting to consider such an important question? Mr. Knight informs us that he was interviewed by an interested party upon the question a few days before he left the city, and that he informed the gentleman that he would not consent to anything that was not for the interests of the town, but that he did not receive an inkling that a "special meeting" would be called. Why were Captain Lesley and Mr. Henderson afraid to present their proposition to the board of trade? Is it not more largely representative of the business interests of Tampa than the town council?

If these men have so much legal right to the reservation why was it necessary to use such extraordinary measures to effect a compromise with anybody? Is there not evidence sufficient to indicate that there is a "black man" in the woodpile? But this is not all. Col. S. M. Sparkman, who is the attorney for Messrs. Lesley and Henderson, and is also the salaried city attorney employed by the council, appeared at the meeting, without notifying the council of his position, that another legal adviser might have been employed in the case, and proceeded to advise the council to compromise with his clients. If this is professional, usual, and right, then we are not posted in legal ethics. We shall not comment upon the majority report of the committee as published above. Its contents and the signatures attached will be sufficient to show in whose interest it was drafted. But we are proud to chronicle that the adoption of this scheme was not unanimous, and that it required the vote of the president of the council to break the tie. For the courage and independence displayed by Dr. J. P. Wall, Thomas E. Jackson, and T. C. Taliaferro the citizens of Tampa owe a tribute of confidence and gratitude. For those members who winced and wiggled before their masters they will doubtless express their righteous contempt should they ever dare to offer their names before the public again. Within forty-eight hours after the passage of the resolution Captain Lesley, with a copy in his pocket, was off for Washington, D. C. With the signature of the president of the council attached, and that of Mayor Post, the instrument is calculated to deceive. It does not represent the sentiment of the people of Tampa; and our assertion is supported by the votes of Dr. Wall, Mr. Jackson, and Mr. Tailaferro, and the opinion of Mr. Knight. What do the citizens propose to do?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition and papers will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MAXEY presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Jefferson, Tex., praying for the restoration of wages at the Government Printing Office to a certain former rate; which was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Austin, Tex., praying the enactment of a law forever prohibiting the immigration of Chinese into the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOAR. I present the petition of James L. Frisbee, of Massachusetts, and several hundred others, workmen who have been employed by the United States since the passage of the law of 1868 and between July, 1877, and December, 1883, in various navy-yards. They have found that while that law, requiring the employment of men but eight hours a day by the Government, was in force they were compelled under an erroneous construction and contrary to the true meaning, intent, and spirit of the law to work ten hours in order to receive a day's wages. They were compelled either to submit to ten hours' work or to submit to a reduction of their wages; and they desire that there may be an act of Congress passed paying them the wages for the extra two hours, or that they may be authorized to bring suit before some proper tribunal, to be clothed with jurisdiction for that purpose, which tribunal shall be required to interpret the law according to the meaning of Congress.

I desire to say that having been cognizant of the purpose of that legislation from the beginning, in my judgment these petitioners are entirely right in their construction of the law, as I have had occasion many times, both in this House and the other, to say during the years which have elapsed since this grievance originated. It seems to me it was the purpose of Congress to test under the Government, with the authority of the Government, the soundness of an economic law which had been affirmed by workingmen of this country as well as by many writers who had no personal interest in the subject, that on a large scale of permanency in ordinary mechanical and manufacturing employments the individual workman will be a larger producer working eight hours a day than working a larger number of hours; that the increased intelligence, activity, skill, vigor, and work will make him a better and a more valuable producer, if he can have the leisure to rest and the respite of the other hours of the day. There was a very remarkable experiment tried upon that question in the United States armory at Springfield, the results of which were quite surprising to persons who had not entertained that opinion before, and which have already been laid before the public.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DOLPH. I present numerous petitions signed by several thousand merchants, traders, land-owners, farmers, and professional men, resident and carrying on business in the seven counties of Oregon which chiefly constitute the Willamette Valley, showing that such counties contained a population at the last census of 65,000 persons; that the assessed property of this population is valued at $42,000,000 and over; and also setting forth the large agricultural resources of the country, and the importance of Yaquina Bay to the commerce of the country; stating that the improvement of Yaquina Bay has been undertaken by the General Government, and praying that an appropriation be made to complete its improvement at the present session of Congress. I ask that one of the petitions, which is not long, may appear in the RECORD without the names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made, and the petitions will be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The petition is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The humble petition of the merchants, traders, land-owners, farmers, and professional men, resident and carrying on business in the seven counties of Oregon which chiefly constitute the Willamette Valley, showeth—

That the seven counties of the State of Oregon now in question contain 2,500,000 acres of land;

That the population by the last census was just 65,000 persons, and is rapidly growing;

That the realized property of this population is returned by the assessors as $42,178,000, or an average of over $650 per capita.

That although only 606,000 acres out of 2,500,000 are in cultivation, yet these seven counties raised in the year 1884-'85 the following, among and in addition to a proportionate quantity of other agricultural and pastoral products, namely: Six million bushels of wheat, 4,000,000 bushels of oats, 2,500,000 pounds of hops, 1,250,000 bushels of apples, and 900,000 pounds of wool; although the wheat yield of the year in question was below the usual average. The above figures are from the official returns in the office of the secretary of the State;

That until the opening of Yaquina Bay to commerce by the construction of the Oregon Pacific Railroad between Corvallis (in the heart of the Willamette Valley) and Yaquina Bay, the only outlet for our products and channel of our traffic was by way of Portland and the Columbia River, involving unnecessary distance and useless expense and delay;

That the improvement of the entrance to Yaquina Bay has been undertaken by the Government of the United States, and out of an estimated requirement of $465,000 only $150,000 has hitherto been appropriated;

That the result so far has been to demonstrate the possibility of entire success in deepening the harbor entrance, so that vessels of the largest size and capacity will be able to enter and leave the port with ease and safety; yet that to leave the work unfinished, in its present state, would be to have inflicted harm on the State of Oregon and its population, in place of untold good;

That since the railroad work in connection with the port of Yaquina was commenced, upward of $125,000 in custom duties have been received by the United States Government, or credited to that port;

That the steamship Yaquina, of 1,500 tons burden, since October 1, 1885, is making regular and frequent trips between Yaquina and San Francisco, carrying a large tonnage in grain and many passengers. The effect of the new route has already been felt from one end of the Willamette Valley to the other, and a large and increasing volume of traffic is seeking the Yaquina harbor;

That the charges for pilotage and towage at Yaquina are and must continue low, because it occupies but half an hour to take a vessel from the deep waters of the Pacific Ocean and land her passengers at the docks in Yaquina Bay, where a vessel lies alongside her wharf in 20 feet of water, in a land-locked and quiet harbor, with anchorage room for the whole commerce of the Pacific coast;

That your petitioners pray for the appropriation at this time of the full sum of $300,000, being the balance of the amount estimated by the United States engineer officers as the cost of completing the improvement of the entrance to Yaquina Bay, believing that Congress will recognize from the facts in this petition the urgency and importance of carrying out this most necessary improvement in accordance with their prayer.

And your petitioners will ever pray.

Mr. PALMER presented a petition of 208 citizens of Barry, Branch, and Calhoun Counties, Michigan, and a petition of 456 citizens of the District of Columbia, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and elsewhere; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLUMB presented a petition of citizens of Ottawa, Kans., praying the opening of the Oklahoma lands to homestead settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 1076) providing for the collection of statistics touching marriage and divorce, to report it with a recommendation that it be laid on the table, and with a written report, which sets forth in substance, while we think the object proposed by the bill is highly important, it being the same bill that the same committee reported at the last Congress, we are of opinion that under the statute creating the Bureau of Labor the Commissioner of that bureau can more conveniently collect these statistics than can the Bureau of Statistics, as the bill provided for; and all that is necessary to accomplish this purpose is to put into the proper appropriation bill an appropriation to enable the Commissioner of Labor to accumulate the statistics.

We therefore recommend that the bill be laid on the table, and I ask that our recommendation, with an amendment which is drawn up in our report, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, so that we shall comply with the rules in regard to its being in order when the proper appropriation bill comes up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont from the Committee on the Judiciary reports back the bill indicated, with a recommendation that it lie on the table, and that the report, with the amendment proposed, be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. SEWELL, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2021) granting a pension to Margaret A. Blake, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 226) granting a pension to Margaret D. Marchand, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1377) to grant the right of way for railroad purposes through the lands of the United States powder depot near Dover, N. J., to the Morris County Railroad Company, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PAYNE. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 736) granting a pension to James D. Reney, to report it adversely. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. PAYNE. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 775) granting arrears of pension to Timothy Kibby, to report it adversely. I ask that it be placed on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. WALTHALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 557) to grant for the use of the public a street across the United States grounds in the city of Chattanooga, in the State of Tennessee, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Capt. John A. Lee, United States Army, praying to be retired with the rank of major, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of War, recommending that provision be made for quarters for keeper of Yorktown Monument, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by an amendment intended to be proposed to the sundry civil appropriation bill making an appropriation of $2,500 for that purpose; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting plans and estimates for the construction of a permanent wharf at Fort Monroe, Va., submitted a report thereon, accompanied by an amendment, making an appropriation of $80,000 for that purpose; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARRISON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 976) for the relief of certain officers of the Signal Service, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MANDERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the following bills, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to:

A bill (H. R. 822) for the relief of William H. Wheeler;
A bill (H. R. 4411) for the relief of A. Gates Lee;
A bill (H. R. 4412) for the relief of John A Coan; and
A bill (H. R. 832) for the relief of D. E. Downing.

Mr. COCKRELL. The Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 215) for the relief of Edward P. Vollum, introduced by me, and referred to that committee at my instance, have instructed me to report the same back adversely, and to recommend that the bill be indefinitely postponed, because the claim provided for therein is already provided for under the general law for the adjustment of claims of officers, &c., for losses in the service.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be postponed indefinitely if there be no objection.

PENSION OF WIDOWS AND DEPENDENT RELATIVES.

Mr. VAN WYCK. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions to report back the bill (H. R. 545) to increase the pensions of widows and dependent relatives of deceased soldiers and sailors with an amendment providing that the pensions to minor children shall be increased from $2 to $4 a month.

In this connection I desire to say that while I shall ask for the speedy consideration of the bill, I shall move that the pension to minors shall be increased to $5 instead of $4, as fixed by the committee. I shall also ask the consideration by the Senate of another amendment, which was not adopted by the committee, to provide that insane, idiotic, or helpless children shall receive the pension given to minor children beyond the existing limit to the time that the disability of insanity or idiocy may continue.

Mr. LOGAN. Is not the Senator from Nebraska going to ask the Senate to take up the bill soon?

Mr. VAN WYCK. I shall ask its consideration by the Senate just as soon as possible.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely wish to say that I hope the Senator having charge of the bill will call it up soon, and that there will be no objection to it and that the bill will be passed just as the House left it. Let the other matters which the Senator has suggested, which I do not oppose and some of which I would favor, be acted upon separately, but let the bill pass if the Senate is in favor of it as the House passed it, so as not to encumber it in any way whatever, and then take up the other matters.

I hope the committee will also report in a very short time the bill introduced by the Senator from Kansas in reference to arrearages, so that we may act upon the bill and decide it one way or another.

I only make these remarks for the reason that I have received, and am receiving every day, so many letters in reference to the matter, and I know there is a great deal of feeling on account of the delay. I hope the Senator will not offer his amendments to the bill, but will let them come up in some other bill, and let this House bill be called up speedily and acted upon.

Mr. VAN WYCK. The committee appreciate and fully sympathize with the suggestions made by the Senator from Illinois, and they have pursued the policy not to place in this or any bill which improves the condition of the soldiers and relates to their pensions any provision except what may be proper and legitimate. In this bill from the House providing for an increase of pension to widows and dependent relatives it was also provided that the pensions to minors shall continue at $2 per month. It is a part of the bill as passed by the House that the pensions to minors shall be continued at $2 per month, and therefore it is legitimate and proper in this bill to provide a rate of pensions for minors and also to continue the pensionable age of minors from sixteen to eighteen years. That is all the amendment proposed by the committee. It belongs to that class of pensions, and that alone. The committee have desired to do precisely what the Senator from Illinois desires; and I believe that at the last Congress we should have passed a distinct pension bill for the soldiers of the Mexican war, and let that stand upon its own merits alone. I am decidedly in favor of that proposition to-day.

It is because the amendments referred to are merely in the line of the bill itself that they have been proposed by the committee. They are proper and legitimate to the bill, as I think the Senator from Illinois will realize when he gives the subject further consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

STATUE OF JAMES A. GARFIELD.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the joint resolution (S. R. 39) to authorize the printing of the proceedings in Congress in accepting the statue of the late James A. Garfield, President of the United States. I report it back favorably and ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLAIMS UNDER FRENCH AND SPANISH TREATIES.

Mr. MANDERSON. There was referred to the Committee on Printing a communication from the President of the United States, in response to a Senate resolution of February 9, 1886, transmitting, with a letter from the Secretary of State, a full report upon the subject of French spoliation claims. The Committee on Printing have communicated with the State Department with reference to the importance of this document, and also with Senators interested in the subject-matter, and believing that more than the usual number should be printed, present a concurrent resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate of the United States (the House of Representatives concurring), That the statements relative to the payments of awards under treaties with France and Spain, transmitted by the President of the United States in response to Senate resolution of February 9, 1886, be printed, and that 5,000 additional copies of said message and statements be printed; of which 1,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate, 2,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, and 2,000 copies for distribution by the Department of State.

NATIONAL SAFE DEPOSIT COMPANIES.

Mr. PIKE. On Friday last I reported adversely from the Committee on the District of Columbia the bill (S. 346) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia," approved January 22, 1867; and the bill (S. 62) enlarging the powers of the Washington Safe Deposit Company, and for other purposes, and the bills were postponed indefinitely. I wish to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bills were postponed indefinitely.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 610) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail in the city of Fort Smith, Ark., with amendments; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 2148) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a building for the use of the United States circuit and district courts of the United States, the post-office, and other Government offices at Williamsport, Pa.," and making an additional appropriation therefor; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 1722) to provide for a joint celebration by the sixteen American republics on the 4th of March, 1889, in honor of the one hundredth anniversary of the Constitution of the parent Republic, the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. CALL. I introduce a bill to accompany the petition which I presented this morning.

The bill (S. 1723) to authorize the entry of certain lands in the State of Florida was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JACKSON (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1724) for the relief of the legal representatives of A. J. Tynes, deceased, of Nashville, Tenn.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. DOLPH introduced a bill (S. 1725) granting an increase of pension to Margaret E. Pierce; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 1726) granting a pension to Augustus Field Stevens; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1727) granting an increase of pension to George W. Williams; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1728) to confirm the title to certain lands in the Territory of Arizona to Francisco Aguilar and his legal representatives; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT SMITH.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further routine morning business the Calendar is in order.

Mr. BLAIR. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, the morning business having been concluded.

Mr. BERRY. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to withhold his motion, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] desires action upon the amendments of the other House to a bill which has just been returned from that body.

Mr. BLAIR. I will yield for that, it being a formal matter, as I understand.

Mr. SPOONER. The House of Representatives has passed and returned to the Senate with amendments the bill (S. 610) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail in the city of Fort Smith, Ark. The bill is returned amended by cutting down the appropriation. A very full showing was made to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which had under consideration the bill, and it is very clear that the appropriation as cut down by the other House is inadequate. I desire to move that the Senate non-concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill. They will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. Page 1, line 13, strike out the words "and twenty-five;" so as to read, "the sum of $100,000."

Page 2, line 2, strike out the word "fifty" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to read, "the sum of $25,000."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The amendments were disagreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I now ask for the appointment of a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves that a committee of conference be appointed. If there be no objection that order will be made.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MAHONE, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. BERRY were appointed.

AID TO COMMON SCHOOLS.

Mr. BLAIR. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill (S. 194) to aid in the establishment and temporary support of common schools.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to section 2:

> And in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money paid in such State shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools in the proportion that the illiteracy of the white and colored persons aforesaid bear to each other, as shown by said census.

Mr. CALL. Before the amendment is voted on I desire to submit a few observations to the Senate in regard to it.

The amendment provides that in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children the money paid in such State shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools in the proportion that the illiteracy of the white and colored persons aforesaid bear to each other as shown by the census.

The bill provides that the money shall be paid out without distinction of race, in the proportion of the illiteracy in a State, to the whole of illiterates as shown by the census.

The amendment is objectionable because it is a reflection upon the States and the principle of government which we have adopted. It departs from the condition imposed by the bill, which is a mere limitation as to the object to which this donation shall be applied, reserving to the United States, if it should not be applied in good faith, the right to discontinue it, and that is sufficient. But it goes further and it requires that there shall be a minute supervision, and that this money shall be applied in the proportion of illiteracy in the different localities, wherever the proportion of illiteracy in the one race or the other shall be greater; that on that account that locality shall be provided for not equally in amount per capita, but in larger amounts per capita as to race, and the fact being that there is a greater amount of colored illiterates, the amendment in fact is that the colored illiterate shall have a greater amount per capita than the white illiterate. The State laws, without discrimination of race, provide that the money shall be applied equally, and it is applied according to the attendance upon the schools, and there is no other method in which it can be applied, and here comes now a provision that while the Constitution imposes under the amendment the duty on the State in spirit, if not in terms, to apply all the public funds of the States equally to the races without discrimination.

While in good faith the Southern States have done that, this amendment requires that there shall be in effect a discrimination, that while the States apply their money equally to the schools that may be organized, giving to each race the full privilege and opportunity alike to organize in each locality a school and appointing a superintendent whose duty it is to see that that is done in every place so far as he has power, for of course education is not compulsory, but making by law the fullest and fairest and equal provision for both races, this amendment comes in and says that you shall not do that, this money which is given by the United States shall not be applied according to your full and equal provision without discrimination of race, but the absolute proportion of illiteracy shall be taken without reference to school attendance, and that sum shall be set apart, and whether the schools are organized or not, whether there is attendance there or not, it shall be paid out in larger amounts per capita to the race containing the larger proportion of illiterates. Now, we will suppose that there is a State where the white people are one hundred thousand in number and the colored people one hundred thousand and the proportion of colored illiterates is 80 per cent. and of whites 20 per cent. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] provides that the colored children shall receive 80 per cent. of this money and the white children 20 per cent. Now, the State law gives each 50 per cent. of the State fund, therefore the colored children will have 80 per cent. plus 50 per cent., and the white children 50 per cent. plus 20 per cent., or 70 per cent. to the colored children's 130 per cent. per capita. And as the colored children's percentage of attendance is less than that of the whites this percentage is increased per capita by a sum equal to 50 or 70 per cent. more per capita, or the colored child will receive per capita about 200 per cent. to the white child's 70 per cent.

That is the unquestionable effect of this provision without reference to attendance, which is the necessary and only practicable rule in all the States, Northern and Southern, of the distribution of public money for schools, for it can not be otherwise paid out, whether it is State or Federal money. But under this amendment it must be paid out, not in the proportion of attendance, not in the proportion of schools with their numbers, but in the fixed proportion of the illiteracy of the one race to the other. That is not practicable, and is in many respects unjust and unwise, and would render inefficient to a large extent the appropriation. But the objection to it is that it is based on both an expressed and implied distrust of the States, and in principle the Senator from Iowa reflects as much upon his own State as he does upon other States, for it is the principle of our Constitution, and if it is not true that Constitution is worthless, that the States are competent, that a sound public opinion will sooner or later in the general, in the average, require them to do that which is the best for the interests of their people; and that is the principle of our Government.

But here we come now to this application of public money in the hands of the States for a public purpose, and we say, "We distrust you; we will do more than require conditions which in good faith you must observe, and for which if not observed we will suspend the money; but we will require a condition implying that you can not be trusted to deal with this money fairly toward the colored people in your communities in your State. We will require you to apply this money so that the two races shall have unequal educational privileges." That is an unnecessary reflection. It is an improper one. It is one violative of the very principle of our Government that the States are the support and strength of the National Government. When after the war the States were restored to the Union it was done under the policy of the Republican party with an appreciation of the fact that the States as organisms could be, should be, and must be trusted, and that they were essential parts of our system of government. Why, then, shall we now adopt an unnecessary amendment, based entirely upon the implied assertion of their infidelity to the performance of their obligations—upon the proposition that they are not necessary and proper agencies to administer the functions of government and to protect the rights and promote the happiness of the people who direct and control the exercise of their powers.

But, furthermore, it is an assertion on the part of Congress that the colored people must look alone to the legislation here for their protection, and that will lead to disturbance and strife and ill-will between the races. There is no man in the Senate who is more willing than I and my colleagues representing these States to do justice to the colored people. I would like to have an industrial and a common school in every colored neighborhood, and that both white and colored children in all the States, Northern and Southern, should have full and ample provision for a common-school and an industrial education, the one being as necessary, if not much more useful, than the other. Having that feeling, and knowing that such is the feeling of the people and the public policy of these States, I object to any assertion which implies the contrary and to any legislation based upon such a proposition. I object again, as most hurtful to all the people of the United States, to any legislation by the Congress of the United States which proposes by any means to give to the colored child two-thirds per capita and to the white child one-third per capita. The people of Iowa and Kansas would condemn this as much as the white people of the Southern States would condemn it, and I believe the intelligent colored people of the South would condemn it as unwise and hurtful to them.

The report of the Commissioner of Education conclusively establishes that these States have performed their duty in this regard with equal fidelity to the Northern States; they compare favorably with the State of the honorable Senator from Iowa by the reports of their own superintendents as to the fidelity, without any conditions imposed by Congress, with which they have discharged their duties in respect to education towards all their people without reference to race or color, and I propose to refer for a moment to these reports made by the superintendents of the different States in order to exhibit that fact.

We should bear in mind that the Southern States emerged from a civil war with their industrial organization destroyed. Whether the labor was there or not, whether the same wealth-creating capacity was there in the soil and labor as has been suggested by Senators here was there or not, it was disorganized both in respect to the white and the colored people. They were passing from a system of compulsory to free labor, uneducated in the one and unaccustomed to the other. It necessarily destroyed the productive capacity of the country for a considerable period of time. It forced large numbers of white people who had never known what the necessity of labor in the fields was; men and women raised in luxury and wealth had to resort to actual labor in the field, and a large portion of the vast cotton production of the Southern States has been ever since produced by that class of people and their children who became a new element in the productive capacity of the country. It left the colored people to begin to learn to labor without other compulsion than the mere necessities of provision for life, and it was a lesson that took time to learn.

So these States went into this new system of education not only with the values of real estate destroyed, not only without the capacity to obtain the means of establishing their agricultural industries except by enormous rates of interest, destructive rates, such rates as was stated by the Senator from Mississippi as required the sale in every Southern State of from one-fifth to one-third of the whole real estate of the country for taxes. They went into it also without that magnificent provision for education given by the United States to some other States in the shape of land which was always unequal and is to-day not only in the specific amounts but in the fact that the lands donated by Congress to the States of Kansas and Iowa and the other Northern and Western States became immensely valuable and were worth from ten to twenty dollars an acre, while in the Southern States they were worth nothing. They never were worth anything more than one or two or three dollars an acre on the average, while because of the increasing immigration to the Northwestern States the donation of Congress was five, six, ten, twenty times more in actual available money than it was in the Southern States.

Now, the true test of the fidelity with which these States have applied their money to the education of both races is to be found in the attendance upon the schools. Take the State of Florida where there is only a partial return, but the proportions are as good as if the returns were complete. There are two or three counties omitted from which returns are not made.

The usual school attendance from six to twenty-one years of age in 1883–'84 was 66,798. (I think the census is incorrect.) There were enrolled in the public schools 58,311. The average of daily attendance was 38,881; the average per cent. of attendance, 53.71. Now, let us see what it is in the State of Iowa. In Iowa the per cent. of attendance to school youth is 48.29, and yet Iowa has a magnificent school fund, an organized system based on the credit of the United States which after the war remained good, the money of the United States remained a circulating value there giving life and value to everything. In the State of Florida everything was ruin, everything was lost; the State had to be rebuilt; yet we find that these States impoverished, with their limited means, without aid from the Government have established a system under which they have an actual attendance of the school youth of 53 per cent. as against 48 in the State of Iowa, and yet we have been told a great deal about self-reliance and the necessity of self-reliance among the Southern people! We have been censured and reproved as if we had come to the Congress and asked the United States to assume all our burdens of taxation, while the fact is that you have invited us to consider and discuss the proper administration of a fund which you have proposed should be placed in the control of the States just as the public lands and their proceeds were, for the advancement of the education of all the people.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Florida allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CALL. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. GRAY. I ask on the figures he has just read which seem to make a showing so much to the credit of Florida, and I believe they are very much to the credit of the State he represents, why it is that he should seek aid from the Federal Government in order to support a school system which is so creditable by his showing to the State he represents? Why should he seek aid from the Federal Government toward that system which is already doing a better work and a greater work than the State of Iowa, which is one of those States that is regarded as not intended to be specially benefited by this bill?

Mr. CALL. I think I can answer that to the Senator's satisfaction. Florida has only money enough to send her children to school three months in the year. Iowa has money enough to send her children for a much longer period of time. I will state to the Senator that his own State of Delaware needs progress, and so does even the State of Massachusetts; and in all the States there is a necessity for more encouragement on the part of somebody; and the General Government, which is the great promoter of intelligence within the limits of its power, which disseminates information where it may constitutionally do so without interfering with the rights and authorities of the States, is in my judgment the proper authority to stimulate every enterprise which is for the good of all the States without interfering with their autonomy or the domestic powers of government belonging to them.

In the State of Kansas there are 411,259 children of school age. There are enrolled in the public schools only 303,601. Even with her magnificent provision for education there are 100,000, nearly one-fourth of the children of Kansas, either because of the poverty of her people—and I apprehend that they are among the richest agricultural people in the world in the general average of their means—one-fourth of the children even of Kansas with her magnificent provision of about 3,000,000 acres of public lands donated by Congress, lands worth $10 an acre, and a half million of dollars of money, proceeds of sales of public lands under the 5 per cent. law, and perhaps averaging more than that, and according to the report of the State superintendent of Kansas one-fourth of the children of school age there are not even enrolled in the public schools.

Mr. INGALLS. A very large proportion of them are at private schools. The Senator's statement is entirely illusory.

Mr. CALL. Let us see. We have the tables here. The average daily attendance is only 207,000, and that is another 100,000 off, and the statistics are made out by the State superintendent of schools of Kansas.

Mr. HOAR. Did the Senator read any statistics in regard to Massachusetts?

Mr. CALL. Not yet. I shall presently.

Mr. HOAR. I thought he said something about Massachusetts.

Mr. CALL. While I do this I do so with the most profound respect for these great communities and for their progress and for their educational systems; but I mean to say that in every community, with our present economics, there is a necessity for new education, for industrial education. It is probably not because the means do not exist there, but because the necessities of the people, the necessities of labor require that even children should devote themselves to some other object than education in schools.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know what statistics the Senator reads from.

Mr. CALL. I read from the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1885.

Mr. HOAR. I have had occasion to verify the fact that within the last year or two there are more children enrolled in the public schools of Massachusetts than there are children of the school age there. I suppose that is accounted for partly by children from other States coming in, and partly by the fact that children outside of the school age are in the common schools, but there are more children enrolled than there are children of school age in the State.

Mr. CALL. I obtained my information from the report of the Commissioner of Education.

Mr. GRAY. I should like to say a word. I have understood that the burden of the argument of the Senator from Florida as well as of the arguments of other Senators in support of this bill on the question of expediency had been that there was a special emergency existing in the Southern States by reason of the mass of ignorance with which they had to struggle owing to the enfranchisement of a previously enslaved race. Now that emergency seemed to me to have been very strongly expressed and very strongly presented and made something of an impression on my mind that there was a special emergency in a portion of our common country which would justify the expenditure of the money of the whole people in order to meet it.

Now, if I understand the argument of the Senator to-day, he is showing, and showing with great clearness and in a way that must gratify his own pride, that the State of Florida, which he in part so ably represents, is quite abreast with some of the most advanced of the Northern States in the matter of education. I would submit, then, that there is no pretense that there is the existence of this special emergency in his State, at least. He has shown, if he has shown anything, that the State of Florida with all these disadvantages has been able to meet them and to overcome them and make a showing of school attendance and school facilities equal to other States, and I think I might add from consulting the statistics of the newspaper, the New York Evening Post, that I have before me, also quite equal to the State of New Hampshire, the State of the Senator who reports and is so ably supporting this bill. The State of Florida is quite abreast with that State. Then I would ask the Senator from Florida whether his argument is still on the ground that there is a special exigency in the State of Florida in view of the figures he has already read?

Mr. CALL. I do not think the Senator from Delaware will discover any inconsistency in the fact that every child in a State may be enrolled and every child may attend school, but if there is only money enough to send him or her to school for one month, while in another State there is money enough to send him six months, the necessity is greater in the one State than in the other. The average in Florida, I think, is not more than three months. There is the element of difference. Then there is the difference of schools inadequately supplied with teachers, because of inability to pay them such salaries as competent teachers can afford to have; then an insufficient number of schools requiring children to travel daily long distances to reach them, thus diminishing their efficiency. The statistics prove the faithful efforts of the State and her school superintendent and the disposition of her people, and not the financial ability of the people to do what ought to be done.

And I was mentioning this to show the fidelity with which these people had endeavored to carry out the duty which they in their constitutions and laws acknowledged to be a duty and in reference to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa which is based upon a distrust of their application of this money without discrimination of race and equally and faithfully for the benefit of both races. That was the point which I was making.

I will stop for a moment to answer the Senator from Massachusetts by reading from Public Document No. 31 of 1878, being a report on the statistics of labor of Massachusetts, which is the best authority I can get to show the condition of things in all the States and by comparison to show how earnestly and how faithfully the impoverished States of the South have endeavored to discharge this duty.

> The total number under twenty years of age employed we find to be 77,871. Of these 6,978 or 8.9 per cent. are illiterate. Those under fifteen years of age (included in the preceding figures for those under twenty), number 21,132, of which 3,144 or 14.8 per cent. are illiterate. We have seen which industries bear the burden of ignorance, and an examination of the city and town showings enables us to discover which cities and towns are largely responsible for this unlawful illiteracy.
> The table given herewith shows 3,215 illiterates among 14,907 persons under twenty years of age employed in eleven cities and towns. This is a percentage of 21.6.

I am not citing that for the purpose of making any reflection upon the State of Massachusetts, which I am willing to testify leads perhaps the civilization of the world in this respect, except perhaps in the way of industrial education; I am citing it to show, conceding its excellence in that respect, the earnestness with which the States of the South, which are now thought unworthy of being trusted, have endeavored to perform this great public duty.

Mr. HOAR. I do not know what publication the Senator is reading from or what the date of it is. I have not the figures from Massachusetts schools at the Capitol; I have them at my house; but I have had occasion to investigate this matter within a few months carefully and thoroughly, and I wish to state to the Senator as the result of a late most thorough return, first that the illiteracy of children of school age in Massachusetts is substantially all among persons of foreign birth. There is substantially no child a native of Massachusetts who could be classed as an illiterate over the age of ten years. There may be a few, but it is not 1 per cent. It is not enough to be more than accounted for by instances of illness unfitting the child for going to school or by mental peculiarity. The other fact which I wish to state is that in the last school year reported, the school year of 1884, there were more children of the school age, which is between five and fifteen, if I recollect, attending schools in Massachusetts than the whole number of children of school age in the State. I say there were more children attending the public schools of Massachusetts than the whole number of children of school age in the State, which is to be accounted for I suppose, as I said just now, partly by the fact that some children not within the school age attend the schools and partly by the fact that some come in from other States.

Mr. CALL. I have no doubt the Senator is perfectly right, as he generally is in such matters.

Mr. HOAR. The State of Massachusetts, in regard to the matter of the education of persons born within its borders—and there is no distinction in the schools between them and others—is at the head of the entire civilized world.

Mr. CALL. I concede that to be so.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to controvert the statement made by the Senator from Massachusetts, but I think, so far as my own State is concerned, it is quite up to Massachusetts on this whole matter of common-school education.

Mr. HOAR. It beats Massachusetts when you mix both foreign and native-born. It is ahead of Massachusetts there. I spoke of the native-born children.

Mr. ALLISON. By the State census, which was taken last year, it is disclosed that only 1.21 per cent. of our people between the ages of ten and twenty-one are illiterate.

Mr. HOAR. One and twenty-one hundredths per cent.?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOAR. In our State among the natives it is one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely wanted to put in a protest on behalf of Iowa.

Mr. CALL. I have none of the feeling that would make a reflection upon States either North or South. If the State of Massachusetts and the State of Iowa can contribute more to the happiness of mankind by a better system of education, by industrial education, than any other States, I shall rejoice in it, and so should I in any other agency that would produce a greater amount of human good; but yet I read in the statistics of labor published by the State of Massachusetts, the ninth annual report of the bureau of statistics of Massachusetts, February, 1878, the following as establishing the necessity of great care and great public consideration to this subject of education; and I believe that the chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor is performing, and the Senator from Massachusetts in giving him his valuable aid, a work for which this country ought to be and will be grateful to them. I read in this report as follows—conceding that Massachusetts is leading the civilization of the world on the subject of education, of common-school education, if not industrial education:

> Of the 439,583 persons representing the farmers, farm laborers, skilled workmen in manufactures and mechanical industries and unskilled laborers we have presented tabulations as regard nativities, periods of age, and prevalence of illiteracy for 348,795, or 74 + per cent. These cover the purely productive occupations, with the exception of the comparatively few persons engaged in fishing and as apprentices, so there can be objection to the statement that the presentations in this part of the report indicate plainly the presence and influence of the foreign-born element in our productive industries.

In these productive occupations the great industries of the country upon which the safety and the prosperity of the whole depend, in the State of Massachusetts in the presence of this magnificent provision for education there are 31,000 out of 348,000 persons who are absolutely by the report illiterate or were in 1878.

Now let us see how Iowa stands by comparison with our Southern States. This is the report of Hon. John W. Akers, State superintendent of public instruction in the State of Iowa, and therefore to be taken as an authentic and truthful statement. In 1884 there were 621,222 children in the State of Iowa. Enrolled in the public schools 469,537 out of 621,222; 152,645 children, or near one-fourth in that State with its magnificent provision for education unenrolled in the public schools of the State. The average attendance was 300,000 out of 621,222, another hundred thousand off. Per cent. of enrollment to school 75.58. Per cent. of attendance to school youth 48.29, and the per cent. of attendance to enrollment 63.89. Now look upon the poorer people here in my own State. Here is your 48 per cent. We have an average attendance in the State of Florida of 53.71 per cent.

Mr. President, you may carry this comparison to all the Southern States, and you will find with the exception of one or two which have the most liberal provision for education—you will find this evidence of their fidelity by the fact of the average attendance in the schools we have. It is only three months. That perhaps may need some explanation. A longer amount of school time among the laboring people would diminish the number, for I have no desire to do injustice, but I say these figures show conclusively the fidelity with which, with their small and insufficient means these States are providing for the education of their people under the most difficult circumstances.

Now the Senator from Iowa proposes to carry his distrust of these people who have accomplished so much in their administration with their very limited means, their small resources, and he proposes to say, "We will give this money according to the proportion of illiteracy, because there the illiteracy of colored people is in excess, and that shall be a fixed amount; and you shall not receive any aid from the Government if you do not apply it regardless of your own State taxation and State resources, which, accepting your constitutional amendment in good faith, they have provided shall be equally given to the children who attend the schools, giving to each race the opportunity and the privilege and the right by law to organize a school wherever there are enough school children for it." Although they have accomplished these results you propose to say to them, "We distrust your application of this money according to this practical and wise rule of equal per capita distribution according to school attendance, and therefore we will fix a proportion not of attendance upon the school, but the proportion of actual illiteracy between the races," which we will add to the equal part of your school taxation which the colored child receives, so as to give the colored children who attend school two or three times more to each colored child than the white child receives. I ask the Senator from Iowa would this result of his amendment be in conformity with the constitutional amendment which he imposed on the States.

I have a feeling of gratitude to the Senator from Massachusetts for the liberal support which he has given to this bill, and for the enlightened principles on which he bases that support. The people of the States ought not to be subject to distrust, nor to such a reflection upon our system of government as seems to be placed upon us. The States are an organism and must be trusted. If they are not trusted, if the Senator from Iowa is right in his idea, and the people of a State have not sufficient virtue to do what is right according to their constitution and laws, but they must be dictated to and required to be restrained and directed by the minutest details, then we have failed in our ideas of government; we have established a government upon a false basis which can not be maintained.

Mr. ALLISON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CALL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. If there were no colored persons in Florida would the Senator from Florida think, after describing the situation of the schools in that State, that it would be necessary to invoke the aid of the National Government for the education of the white children of that State?

Mr. CALL. While there are as many people who have not had the opportunity of education as there are now, I would, if Florida had only the same means she now has.

Mr. ALLISON. Then the Senator thinks that under the present situation in Florida, with reference to the white race alone, Federal aid, or aid from the National Government, is necessary in order to provide such school facilities as they require?

Mr. CALL. I think we have not enough. Without saying it is necessary, I think it would be very wise on the part of the Government to give aid to them, just as I think it was wise to give it to Iowa. The provisions of this bill will not more than equalize other States with Iowa in the bounty received from the National Government.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, do I understand the Senator from Florida to state that the colored race in Florida is in the same condition practically as the white race with reference to education, or are they more illiterate?

Mr. CALL. They are more illiterate, of course.

Mr. ALLISON. Being more illiterate, do they not require a larger expenditure of money for the purposes of education than do the white race in Florida?

Mr. CALL. Certainly, no doubt of that.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, is there any injustice, if that be true, in applying this money where this education is needed?

Mr. CALL. Yes, it is manifest. In the first place you say that you can not trust the State of Florida to do it.

Mr. ALLISON. So far from stating that, I propose that the State of Florida shall do exactly what the Senator says he wants her to do, educate her people according to their illiteracy.

Mr. CALL. But you say, find out how many colored illiterate people there are in the State of Florida, and by that fix the proportion that is to go to them and to the whites; it shall be their money, and it shall be applied to no other purpose than for their education per capita. That is your amendment. The State of Florida replies to you that under the amendments to the Constitution which you have adopted, which we recognize as a part of our law, we tax our people, and we apply those taxes to the colored people equally with the whites, and your amendment to this bill comes in and says that while we do this we shall apply the money given us by the National Government, not in proportion to attendance upon the schools, but "we will give you in solido a sum of money according to the number of colored illiterates, which you shall apply to no other purpose" but per capita to the colored illiterates, and if that should be done it would create an inequality. You would give by that amendment the colored people an equal portion of the tax raised by the State, and then you would give them the larger proportion in proportion to illiteracy, while the State would apply in proportion to the actual and practical attendance upon the public schools. This you would fix by an arbitrary rule, and fix it upon the ground that the State can not be trusted to do it. That is the objection to the amendment.

I have said, Mr. President, that the States have largely different resources for the education of their children. One has lands that are immensely valuable. In the other the lands are scarcely salable at any price whatever. In one the donations by Congress because of the increased immigration into those States ran up rapidly into large amounts of money and became vast funds built up for the permanent education of the people. I find that California received 6,749,394 acres of land; that Minnesota received nearly 3,000,000 acres—2,969,000; Oregon, 3,329,000; Kansas, 2,801,000; Nevada, 3,000,000; Nebraska, 3,702,000; Colorado, 3,000,000, and so on, while Florida received 908,000. Compare that 908,000 acres of land in its money value, in its practical uses for school purposes, with the nearly 3,000,000 acres received in the State of Kansas. The one would be a fund of $30,000,000; the other would be less than $1,000,000. Alabama received of the 2, 3, and 5 per cent. of net proceeds $1,012,837.03; Arkansas, $232,317.03; Colorado, $33,162; Iowa, $626,075; Florida, $33,162.27. That shows the difference in the value of land in one State and another. The same beneficence was intended by the law, but the disparity in value was fortunate for some States because of the immense increase of population in their midst. So on it runs. I will not here say more on this subject.

Mr. PLUMB. May I ask the Senator what makes land more valuable in Iowa than in Florida?

Mr. CALL. Because you have more people there.

Mr. PLUMB. What makes people go to Iowa in preference to Florida?

Mr. CALL. Because you have better lands there, better for grain, better for that kind of labor which you have in Kansas. The old labor under the slave system went into cotton, tobacco, and sugar regions, and the other labor went into the grain-producing countries.

Mr. PLUMB. I think perhaps the difference between Florida and Iowa goes deeper than the Senator from Florida is willing to admit. The attractiveness of Iowa as compared with Florida is not simply the fertility of the soil. It is the class of people who go there and the institutions they find when they get there.

Mr. CALL. It is well for every one to have a good opinion of himself and his people, and I do not object to the Senator from Kansas entertaining the opinion that the people of Kansas are the best people in the world. I think there are two or three hundred thousand people there from all parts of the world, by the census reports from all nationalities and all races and of all kinds, and it may be the fact of their being in Kansas makes them better than anybody else. If so, I am gratified that such is the fact. I am content with the people among whom I was born and have grown up. I do not see elsewhere in the exhibition of virtues and excellent qualities any better people, nor do I see any people who have performed the trusts committed to them with any more fidelity and success than the Southern people, to whose care the destinies of the colored people were committed when they were sent away from the Northern States, who within a century have brought them from a barbarian's condition to such a state that they have had the rights of citizenship given to them, and are regarded as factors in the civilization of the day. That is a trust which the Senator from Kansas has not performed; nor do I see that in respect to the education of the children of his State and the number of children in Kansas who are to-day, according to the report which I will read, without school education because, perhaps, of the economies which make them labor always without opportunities of education, that he has performed the trust of educating those people any better than the impoverished people of the South have done with their proportion of actual school attendance to-day; and that is the test, and not declarations as to which people one thinks the best or which the worst.

Mr. PLUMB. Will the Senator permit me to say to him that while I do not question that the South has civilized the black man, and the people of Kansas have not had as much to do in that way as the people of Florida have done, I want to call his attention to the fact that that is not the fault of the Southern people themselves.

Mr. CALL. I think we had better let by-gones be by-gones.

Mr. LOGAN. Then what do you mention them for?

Mr. CALL. I have not mentioned them. I beg pardon of the Senator from Illinois, I have not touched upon that subject.

Mr. LOGAN. I beg to ask a question.

Mr. CALL. Let me vindicate myself from that remark. I have said that I have the greatest respect and admiration for the people of Kansas, for the people of Illinois, for the people of Massachusetts. I have no reflection to make upon them of any kind.

Mr. LOGAN. What I rose for was this: The Senator seems to be discussing a proposition which I think is very foreign to this subject, and that is as to the amount of land Florida received and the number of acres of land Iowa received. My understanding of this proposition is that it is to be based upon the illiteracy of the people and not upon the quantity of land they received.

Mr. CALL. Yes.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, if the Senator would confine himself to the illiteracy of the people of Iowa and his own State, probably the difference would be more marked than the reference to the quantity of land. I find in his own State about 88,000 children of school age, and 39,000 of them I believe go to school. I believe that is about the way it runs.

Mr. CALL. Let us see. The pertinency of my remarks is this: I am discussing an amendment to the bill that is based upon the idea that the State of Florida can not be trusted to apply this money fairly to all her children without respect to race or color, and the Senator from Kansas who has just spoken has made that a very strong point. He has referred to the want of self-help, and he has made a great many reflections upon the people of the Southern States and upon the State of Florida.

Mr. LOGAN. I have nothing to do with that. I find in a report that I have here, which may not be precisely accurate, that the school population of Florida is 88,677, and the number enrolled in the public schools is 39,315. That is taken from the census report.

Mr. CALL. The report which I read is the report of the Commissioner of Education, and it is based on the "reports of Hon. E. K. Foster and Hon. Albert J. Russell, State superintendents of public instruction, for the two years indicated, with some figures from Hon. George P. Raney, in the Peabody fund report for 1884." The figures are as I stated at first, but I think there are more children; I think there is a larger number of children in the State; but this report states that there are two or three organized counties from which returns had not been received at the time the report was made. It says 66,198 of school age; enrolled in the public schools 68,311; per cent. of average attendance of school youth 53.71. That is the feature I have been speaking of. The percentage of attendance is the test in every community of the extent to which they avail themselves of the advantage of school education.

Mr. LOGAN. I call the Senator's attention to the part in reference to his own State, not for the purpose of making the contrast——

Mr. CALL. I understand.

Mr. LOGAN. But for the purpose of calling his attention to the inaccuracy of the report he is reading from; he will find the census reports differing very materially from that which he reads, by thousands.

Mr. CALL. The census was made some years ago, a good many years ago.

Mr. LOGAN. Not very many years ago. The report which I have given is the number of school children at that time, a much greater number than he read. Your report now made is sixty-six thousand children of school age. The census gives the enumeration of eighty-eight thousand children of school age in your own State. So there is an inaccuracy somewhere.

Mr. CALL. Yes; I so stated when I first referred to the subject, but the fact is not important in this connection.

Mr. LOGAN. I merely called the Senator's attention to it so that he might see that there is certainly quite an inaccuracy in one or the other report. The report of the census is much more favorable to his State than the report he reads from.

Mr. CALL. There were several counties stated in the report before me not to have been heard from, and the report is based upon the 66,000, leaving out the counties not heard from, so that the inaccuracy was in advance stated; but the proportion remains the same. It is a large proportion; it compares favorably with Iowa or Kansas, and with all these States, in the actual attendance upon the schools; and the report shows every dollar of taxation which the State can bear has been imposed on her people, and it shows also an equal taxation compared with the Northern States for that purpose even upon these communities with so much smaller resources.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator does not seem to understand the point I was trying to suggest.

Mr. CALL. I understand the point well enough.

Mr. LOGAN. I will state it again if the Senator will allow me. I beg pardon for interrupting him.

Mr. CALL. I do not object.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator makes his estimate and percentage upon a report that gives but 66,000 school children in his State. That reduces those of school age some 20,000; so that the percentage he makes can not be correct. It increases the percentage of those going to school over and above what the percentage would be in a State where the enumeration is made accurately. It was to that I desired to call his attention, that his percentage can not be correct in reference to the children going to school and those of school age in his State when the difference is so very great, some 20,000.

Mr. CALL. The Senator is mistaken. You might say the percentage might be more or it might be less, it might be varied by the amount; but the variation might be a larger percentage because of the better attendance of those not reported. That is the only possible difference. And the probability is that the percentage of school attendance to school population would not be materially changed.

Mr. LOGAN. But the percentage of 53 as to 60,000 would be much greater than the percentage of attendance to 88,000.

Mr. CALL. The percentage might be more or might be less. You mean to say that for the remaining 20,000——

Mr. LOGAN. No, I mean to say that that report of children of school age on which you base the percentage of those going to school as a comparison is much greater according to that report than it would be if the report was accurate in reference to the number of those entitled to go to school. That is what I mean.

Mr. CALL. You mean to say this, and that is all you can correctly say, that of the 20,000 children not enumerated and not reported here if the proportion of those that went to school was less than the proportion of those already enumerated, this would be to that extent reduced. But then there is just as much reason to believe that with the 20,000 not reported the average attendance upon the schools would be better as there is that it would be less, so that after all this is substantially correct.

Now, to come to the Senator's own State, Illinois, let us see how the figures stand. In all this I am not endeavoring to institute a comparison for the purpose of casting a reflection upon any State. I admit the efficiency with which these duties have been performed by them; I admit that the Northern States have been advancing the civilization of the world by their system of public instruction; but I am saying that these implied imputations and reflections upon the Southern people are unjust; that they are States of the Union, and with an enlightened public opinion, with faith in the improvement of all mankind, and with generous, true, and noble efforts they are endeavoring with equal earnestness and zeal to contribute their part, under much greater disadvantages than the people of Kansas or Iowa or Illinois, to the greater and happier future of our race, and the statistics I have read conclusively prove this statement to be true.

Now let us see what are the statistics in the State of Illinois, with their great provision for public education which we have not in these States—equally with that here proposed—a bounty from the State of Virginia and from the National Government. The children of school age, according to the report of the State superintendent, Hon. Henry Rabb, for the two years indicated, 1883 and 1884, was 1,069,274; enrolled in graded public schools 328,705; enrolled in ungraded public schools 399,976; average daily attendance 485,625. The whole number in public schools 728,681 out of 1,069,274. Per cent. of enrollment to school youth, 68.14; per cent. of average attendance, 45.42; and with an average attendance of 485,562 out of 1,069,274, or 583,649 children on an average in that State without public-school education.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, if the Senator will allow me, I should like to call his attention to one thing in reference to Illinois, inasmuch as he has mentioned that State, that perhaps he is not aware of. Illinois has over three million population. In Illinois we have, besides our common-school system and our graded schools, private schools that are not enumerated there. We have in Illinois twenty-eight colleges that are filled with students, and we have all varieties of schools outside of the common schools. So the statement there does not give the facts in reference to the children of Illinois, except those who attend the common schools.

Mr. CALL. The proportion as stated in this report of Hon. Henry Raab ought to be correct. He puts the number of pupils in private schools at 75,821. That still leaves 500,000 children an average of school age in the State of Illinois without any instruction at all or any attendance on schools if this report is correct. It is no reflection on the State of Illinois. Education is to be the great business of the age in the future, not war, not vast appropriations for the destruction of mankind, but education, industrial education, for the preservation of human life, by which the children and men and women of the country will be enabled to be self-supporting and free from the oppression of poverty, of ignorance, want, and pauperism; and it is no reflection on these States that they are not able to have a compulsory system of education which will bring every child to the public schools, but it should admonish Senators how far they are from the truth in their harsh assertions as to the Southern States and the Southern people.

I am not suggesting points of difference for the purpose of making imputations. I only wish to show that the presence of the large uneducated body of people in these States is not attributable to a want of intelligent and zealous effort on the part of the people and the State governments either South or North in their endeavor to educate their people.

Now let us compare the magnificent fund the State of Illinois has to educate her people with that of other States. The whole expenditure for public schools was $9,628,186; valuation of public school property, $21,038,489; amount of school fund, $9,437,714; average monthly pay of men teachers, $51.31; average monthly pay of women, $40.44. Compare that even per capita with the small sum which the State of Florida has to educate her children, notwithstanding the same tax is imposed in the State of Florida as in other States, and consider the fact that the children of that State are dependent entirely upon her taxable resources derived from her industries with a small contribution from the Peabody fund and the agricultural endowment given by Congress.

In the State of Florida the means for the support of the State public schools come first from the interest on the common-school fund distributed among the counties in proportion to the number of children in each between four and twenty-one years of age. That is a tax imposed. In the State of Florida all the money, all the bonds, and all the investments which were made before the war were lost. Those bonds were swept away. The school fund of that State invested in bonds was sold, I believe, under a decree of Judge Woods, of the United States court, to pay a debt of a railroad company for which certain individuals were responsible who have grown vastly rich upon the property of the corporation the debts of which the school fund was sold to pay for. It is now raised by a tax upon the people of the State distributed among the counties in proportion to the number of children in each between the years of four and twenty-one; second, from a State school tax of not less than 1 mill on $1 annually; third, from an annual county tax not to be less than one-half the amount apportioned for the year from the State school fund. These are the resources on which the State of Florida supports the system of public instruction, as stated in the report of the Commissioner of Education.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the school age?

Mr. CALL. The school age is from six to twenty-one years; I think that is the statement of this report. Not only have they done that, but they have provided a school for deaf mutes and for the blind, and made an appropriation of $10,000 for 1883 and the same for 1884 to aid this good work. The city of Saint Augustine made a gift of five acres of land and $1,000 in money. There is also a reformatory industrial school suggested by the commissioner of education, Mr. Russell, a most efficient and capable officer of the State, who is devoted to this work.

I am comparing the educational statistics of the State of Florida with the State of Iowa for the purpose of showing the trust and confidence which ought to be reposed in that State as in the other States. Now, let us see what the taxes and resources of the State of Iowa are. The public schools are sustained from the income of a State school fund and from county and district taxes in Iowa. That is a great fund which I have already alluded to.

School finances.	1883-'84.	Increase.
Whole expenditure for public schools	$5,856,068	$297,809
Valuation of State school property	10,430,247	481,004
Permanent State school fund	4,009,866	328,434

Now let us see what the taxes are:

The State fund, comprising the proceeds of public school lands sold and rented, of intestate estates, and such other means as the General Assembly may provide, is distributed to the districts in proportion to the number of youth five to twenty-one.

The same law precisely, not in proportion to the number of illiterates but to the number of youths attending school, every community having the right, and it is the only practicable rule, to organize its own schools, having a sufficient number of scholars, and receive equally from the public funds.

County taxes must be not less than 1 mill nor more than 3 mills on the dollar; district taxes must not exceed 10 mills on $1 for a school-house fund, $5 a pupil for a contingent fund, or $15 for each resident pupil for a teachers' fund, this last including the amount received from the State by semi-annual apportionment.

In Florida, as far as the State is concerned, and in every community I suppose where they are able, though the same efficient district school system is not provided, they contribute to the support of schools from the private funds of the people. You have a better system because the Northern and Western States have more population, and are able to have more schools. There are more people in a locality who will be accessible to the school; but take a community where the people reside far apart—you can not have schools there. There must be some contiguity of residence.

The tax in the State of Iowa, 1 mill, is the same as in the State of Florida, so far as the State tax is concerned. Then the county tax, which corresponds with your district tax, is one-half the amount given by the State from all these several sources. The permanent school fund is itself sustained by a tax on the whole people. It being, as I understand, a funded debt, as to which the State has assumed the obligation and taxed the people to pay it. That is the condition of things at present.

I have thought it proper, Mr. President, not to allow the amendment to be voted upon without expressing this objection to it. I hope it will not be adopted. I trust this measure of confidence which the people of these States have earned by their conduct, the fidelity with which they have endeavored to discharge this duty of public education, will be appreciated and accorded to them; and that the bill as originally reported, which contains all the restrictions and all the conditions that are wise and useful, may be passed.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I do not propose to discuss the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. I have objections to this measure as a whole, and no amendment whatever will reconcile me to it. None that has been adopted, none that it is possible to adopt, can reconcile me to the proposition.

The bill proposes to take out of the public Treasury in the next eight years the sum of $77,000,000. To that proposition I am opposed. I have some respect for the people who pay the money into the public Treasury. Our people have been struggling under heavy taxation for the last twenty-five years, and have been taxed as no other people ever were taxed. They have bent their necks to the yoke and their backs to the burden with a patience that is truly remarkable. Nothing but the vast resources of this country could ever have enabled the people of the United States to bear up under the measure of taxation to which they have been subjected.

This proposition is to tax them further in the next eight years to the extent of $77,000,000 for a purpose to which Federal taxation has never heretofore been applied. It is an enlargement of the liberal use of the taxing power which we have heretofore made. It is a bald proposition to find another purpose for which the taxing power may be exercised and the burdens of the people further increased. I am opposed to any such extension of the taxing power exercised by Congress. There are legitimate purposes for taxation which the people have to meet. The maintenance of the Government, the carrying on of the ordinary affairs of the Government, are subjects for which the people have to be taxed, and for which it is right and proper that they should pay contributions to the Treasury; but it is not every conceivable purpose for which the people are properly and legitimately liable to taxation. I hold that the promotion of education is not a legitimate subject for the exercise of the taxing power of Congress. That is a subject which belongs to the people primarily. The obligation is placed on the parent to educate his child if he is able, and if he is not able the State ought to assist and provide the means whereby the children of the State may be educated; but it is not a duty devolving upon Congress.

I hold there is no authority or warrant in the Constitution to tax the people for any such purpose. But if there were I think that it would be unwise to exercise that power at present. Even if the object were legitimate for which the tax could be imposed, it would be an unwise thing to do, because we have now a debt somewhere between a billion and a half and two billion dollars, for which provision has to be made. We are to-day without a navy. I was talking only yesterday with a naval officer and he said to me we had not a single ship in the service with which we could meet any respectable ship of any foreign power in battle, nor had we one by which we could run away and avoid a battle if we should meet an enemy on the sea. Propositions are here and have been pending in the Senate for years to build up a navy. Without a navy we propose to increase the taxes imposed upon the people, and instead of building up a navy for the defense of the country, instead of erecting coast defenses to protect the country from invasion, we propose to apply money raised by taxation to a subject which has never before received the consideration of the American Congress.

Sir, if we must lay new taxes on the people, let us apply them to the legitimate objects for which Government may tax the people. Let us apply them to building up a navy, to building up our coast defenses, preparing this country to resist invasion if invasion should at any time be attempted. Instead of that, this proposition is to apply it to education, a subject which the States themselves are responsible for and for which they ought to make the necessary provision.

But, Mr. President, if the object itself was legitimate, if the country could bear the taxation proposed in this bill properly, and if the subject of education was a proper subject with which the Congress of the United States had to deal, then I say to attempt to take this money from the people and distribute it in the mode provided in the bill is inequitable and unjust. These taxes are paid into the public Treasury by the whole people. They belong to the people before they are received by the tax-collector and placed in the Treasury; and if there is a surplus left, if there is money there for which the Government has no use, it ought to be returned to the people if it could be returned as nearly in proportion to the ratio in which they paid it into the Treasury as could be possible. But instead of that, instead of dividing it thus according to the population of the States or according to the amount of taxes paid by the States, you propose a reverse ratio of distribution to pay it in accordance to illiteracy, in other words to pay it in a reverse proportion to the share in which it has been paid by the people of the respective States. That is a wholly inexcusable mode for the distribution of the public funds if your object is to distribute them back to the States that paid them. The whole principle and the mode of carrying the bill into operation is liable to the objection of injustice to the people who are to pay the taxes which will be required.

But, Mr. President, there is no necessity for this taxation. I have heard it stated in debate that the object of this was to remedy the illiteracy of the country. There is illiteracy in every State of the Union—more in some States than in others—but there is no necessity for the Congress of the United States undertaking to remedy that illiteracy. There is not a State in this Union but what is able to provide for the education of every child in it, not one; and while I have heard in this debate about the poverty of the South, or the people of that section, that they were unable to educate the vast amount of illiterate youth in those States, I say they are as able to-day to educate their children as the States of the North.

Why, sir, look at their resources. They have almost a monopoly of the cotton-planting of the world. Their cotton fields produce annually about $300,000,000 worth of cotton. They have the tobacco fields of the country; they have the sugar and the rice; they have natural advantages which no other section of this country has. Besides that they have vast resources of mineral wealth in iron and coal, and then their industries are springing up, their manufactures are rivaling the manufactures of the North, especially in cotton and in iron. Tell me that that people, with all the natural resources which a beneficent Providence has given to them, are not able to rise to the emergency of educating their own children! I do not believe a word of it.

Why, sir, they possess another advantage; they have an abundance of labor and cheaper labor than any other section of this country; and I hazard nothing in saying that the difference between the cost of their labor as compared with the labor of the Northern section of the country, is sufficient of itself to educate every child in the Southern States, black and white. And yet are they to reach forward the hand of a mendicant to ask the bounty of the General Government? Sir, I do not know what kind of a spirit it may be that animates their breasts; but for one, representing a State that has some of the colored population in it, I never want to see a dollar of this money applied to the education of the white or colored people of Delaware, because I represent in part a State that I hold is able to educate, if she has the disposition, every child, white and black, within her borders. She has none of the natural resources of many of these other States; she is without mineral wealth, and her whole sources of revenue are from taxation; but she is fully able to educate every child within her borders whenever she has the disposition to do it, and I hold that is true of every State in this Union.

Mr. President, what authority have you for levying a tax for any such purpose? I have not heard all this debate; I have been away much of the time the bill has been before the Senate, but I have heard enough to know that nothing else can be found except that clause in the Constitution which is claimed to authorize Congress to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, &c., for the purpose of paying the debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. What is meant by that? Was it to give unlimited discretion to Congress to lay taxes for any and every purpose which in the judgment of Congress might be proper? Is it contended that under the clause to provide for the general welfare and common defense Congress may lay its hands upon the property of the people of this country ad libitum, and extort money by taxation from the pockets of the people and apply it according to their own discretion? Is that the meaning of that clause of the Constitution? Why, sir, it has never been held so. Mr. Madison did not hold it to be the true construction of that clause. The general welfare is to be promoted by the exercise of the special grants of power to Congress in the eighth section of the first article of the Constitution. If there was any ambiguity or doubt in reference to what is meant by the general welfare you must turn to other provisions of the Constitution and interpret it as a whole and see what it means. When you turn to subsequent clauses in the eighth section of the first article you find that Congress may establish post-offices and post-roads, for instance. If the meaning attempted to be put on the general-welfare clause is such as is insisted upon, could not Congress have established post-offices and post-roads without any special grant of power for that purpose?

So again there is a grant of power to raise and support armies. If the meaning of the general-welfare clause is that which is contended for, could not Congress have done that under the general provision without any special grant of power in reference to raising and supporting armies? So with reference to a navy; Congress is empowered by special grant to maintain a navy. I ask could they not have done it under this general provision to provide for the common defense and general welfare if the meaning and true interpretation of that provision is what is insisted upon in this debate? Most unquestionably. And I say here now, that no friend of this bill can name any single object for which Congress can legitimately provide that could not have been done under the general power to provide for the common defense and general welfare if the interpretation sought to be put upon it is the correct interpretation.

But, sir, the men who framed the Constitution and the men who adopted the Constitution never conceived of any such interpretation being placed upon it, and hence they went on to delegate in the Constitution by special grants the powers which Congress exercise. It might provide for the common defense and the general welfare by raising and equipping armies, by calling out the militia, by building a navy. The true interpretation by the Father of the Constitution, especially by Mr. Madison, was that Congress might provide for the common defense and general welfare in carrying out what grants of power were specially delegated to Congress in the eighth section of the first article. So that when you look at the Constitution as a whole and interpret the particular phrase general welfare in the Constitution by the general purposes and intent of the Constitution, you will find that this attempted construction of the provision in reference to the common defense and general welfare has no true foundation.

But, sir, if you look to the history of the times when the Constitution was adopted, and the temper and spirit of the people of that period, you must conclude that there was no such purpose in providing that Congress should levy taxes to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare as is now claimed. If you look at the Constitution historically to ascertain what was intended, you must come to the conclusion that no such purpose was intended as that sought to be given to this clause. What are the facts? Our people had resisted the taxation of Great Britain. They had protested in every possible form against the oppressive use of the taxing power by Great Britain, and they were finally compelled to resist the exercise of that power by open war, which resulted in the independence of this country. They were jealous of the taxing power; and when they framed the articles of confederation they withheld from the Congress under the Confederacy the power to lay and collect taxes; but they provided that the common fund should be raised by the contributions of the different States.

So jealous were they of the taxing power that they refused to intrust the power to lay and collect taxes to the Confederate Congress; and can you now suppose that the temper of the people has changed, and when they came to form the Federal Union that they consented to yield unlimited control of the subject of taxation and surrender it up to Congress? Not at all. Every person familiar with the history of the times knows that it was with great reluctance the States of this Union consented to invest Congress with the taxing power at all, and nothing but the failure of the States to respond to the call under the articles of confederation and the embarrassment that resulted therefrom ever would have induced the people of this country to invest Congress with the power to lay and collect taxes at all.

So, in whatever aspect the question of the right to tax the people is looked at, whatever view you take of it, you must come to the conclusion that it never was intended by the framers of the Constitution in that clause which authorizes Congress to lay and collect taxes, &c., to invest Congress with an absolute power over the subject of taxation both with respect to the extent to which they would exercise it and to the objects to which they were to apply the money raised by taxation.

Mr. President, is this a benevolence? Is it a charity? Then have you not some other objects of charity as well as the illiterates of this country? In every hamlet and town, in every city and village, you have poor people that are starving in garrets or freezing in cellars, without food, fire, or clothing. Why are they not a legitimate object of the benevolence and charity of Congress as the illiterates of the country?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him where he gets from the Constitution the right to appropriate money for charitable purposes? He has been arguing that question. I know that money has been appropriated in that way, and I ask him whether he can give me now anything but the general-welfare clause as authority for it?

Mr. SAULSBURY. For my part I will say to the Senator that I have always believed that this Government was not to be the almoner of charities for any purpose. I voted against the appropriation for the Centennial Exhibition held within 75 miles of my own town.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. How about sufferers by the flood on the Mississippi River?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not know how I voted on that, but I know I have a conviction that this Government is not to be the almoner of charities. Oh, I have seen—if you call for precedents—I have seen the money of the people squandered for various purposes that there was no constitutional power to squander it for; I have seen it squandered in extravagance that ought not to have been indulged in; but my general view of this question is that Congress has no power to take money out of the people's pockets for charitable purposes. But if they have, if they are to do it, then I say there are other objects of charity that have equal claims upon the benevolence of Congress. You have men and women to-day starving in your cities and in every portion of the country. You see the tramps out of work who are traveling broadcast over your land. You have seen and known that there are men to-day, honest men, anxious to work for their bread and for their meat to support their families, that are out of employment. Are they not as much objects of charity, when their children around them are starving and naked, as the illiterates of the South? You have many other objects to which you could apply your charities if Congress is to convert itself into an almoner of bounty and charity to all mankind. Against all such appropriation of the public money, raised by taxation out of the people, I protest here and now. Confine your appropriations to the legitimate objects of government, and the people will bear it cheerfully and ought to bear it. The people ought to supply the Government every dollar that it needs for its legitimate governmental purposes; but they have a right to complain, to murmur at their servants in this Hall and in the other House, whenever they attempt to lay the heavy hand of taxation upon them for illegitimate purposes not warranted by the Constitution which we have all sworn to support.

Mr. President, what is to be result? Suppose you pass this bill; look at the consequences. In the first place, it makes provision only for eight years. What will be the result at the expiration of that term? You have taught the people of the States their dependence upon Congress. They will come here and clamor, not for $77,000,000 in eight years, but for a much larger appropriation, and you are forming a precedent to-day that will return to plague you hereafter with reference to appropriations for the same object.

Ah, but say the friends of this measure, we hope to relieve the illiteracy in eight years. You are doing more, Mr. President; you are withdrawing the efforts and energies of the people of the several States from the subject of education themselves. Common experience teaches everybody that everything of value is a matter which costs the people something. Only those things for which men make sacrifices do they appreciate; and whenever you relieve the people of the Southern States or any other States from the obligation to provide for their own children, you have lessened their interest in their public schools, which will be of more detriment to their public schools than all the money you propose to give in this bill will be a benefit to them. That will be the legitimate and natural consequence. You will weaken the efforts of the people of the several States to provide for the education of the children within those States. You will weaken their general interest in the subject of education, and you will bring them here at the expiration of eight years clamoring for a much larger appropriation than that proposed to be given in this bill.

But that is not all, sir. You will invite other applications. You will invite the men who are restless to-day, the labor organizations and other associations of men, to come here and say, "You bestowed your charity to relieve illiteracy; bestow your charity on us to relieve us; we are out of employment." Many of the men who compose those labor associations are worthy men, honest men, anxious to toil for a living, and yet are out of employment. Doubtless there are men, who connect themselves with those associations, of socialistic and communistic sentiments, perhaps enough to control them; but when you become the almoner of charities, dealing out money from the public Treasury for the removal of illiteracy, you invite all these orgnizations of these people that believe they have as much right upon the public bounty as others, you invite them here, and their voices will be heard in these corridors and around this Capitol. Some man will rise in his place in the Senate and voice their wishes. I warn you, Senators, that this is a precedent which will come home to plague in more ways than one, and I beseech you to think carefully in reference to what you are about to do, for I suppose this bill will pass, but I was determined that it should not pass without at least my protest against it.

Why, sir, we know to-day that there is a restlessness in the country, a restlessness arising from want. Men who are willing to work are out of labor. There is a restlessness arising from a communistic feeling that would fasten upon the toil of others, that would disorganize and bring everything to chaos in order that their particular interests might be advanced. Against this you ought to erect barriers, and not extend to them invitations to come here and clamor around these halls. Let us be careful in our legislation. Let us appropriate the money and let us teach the people of this country that the taxes raised from the people are to be applied legitimately, economically, to legitimate objects, and for no other purpose whatever, and you will do more to silence this restlessness and clamor than anything else.

Why, sir, your donations of public lands to railroad corporations, your subsidies that you have granted have educated the people to look to Congress, to look to this as a paternal Government where every man may come and place his hands in the public Treasury and take out what he wants. Are the people, the tax-payers of the country, to have no consideration? Are they to be put up to be fleeced by every person who comes here and extends an impecunious hand and asks for the charities of the Government?

Sir, for one I shall vote against this measure, and no possible amendment to it can put it in a shape that I would vote for it.

I deplore the illiteracy that is in the country as much as others do. I will not take money out of the public Treasury for the purposes of this bill; I will not help impose taxes on the people of this country to promote education in the States. For one I object to this bill and to every feature and provision of it from beginning to the end.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Mr. President, I have listened to speeches when gentlemen were running for office delivered on both sides of a question, but I think this is the first instance in which I have ever heard one that was delivered on four sides, running from the Constitution to the Knights of Labor.

I too, sir, am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa. I am opposed to it for a very different reason than that assigned by the Senator from Delaware. I am for the public free-school system; I am a sincere advocate of free and general education; and I undertake to say that if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa discriminating between the races should become a part of this bill and the bill should then become a law, you would so discriminate as that the people of the States would destroy the system through which this money is to be paid out. That is my objection to it.

You say by this amendment, if I understand the English language, that the colored child shall have three dollars and the white child one. That is about what the amendment is. Any man who understands the relation of the races in the South, any man who understands the natural prejudice that has continued to exist since the freedom of the slave, must know that the white people will at once destroy the free-school system when the Federal Government has said that it will discriminate, that it will not allow the States to do it by the very constitutions under which they were readmitted into the Union. Destroy the free-school system of Virginia, for instance, and not one dollar of this money can go to either whites or blacks, because it is provided that it shall go to the public schools of the State in this proportion, and I repeat that the moment you draw this distinction, that moment you justify those people in destroying the public schools.

No man who is the friend of public schools, no man who believes in the education of the black race of the South and understands this bill can vote for this amendment. Say or think as you please, when you discriminate here you just intensify the now subsiding prejudice between the races in the South. I would rather not have the bill passed, I would rather let ten years go by without the benefit of this bill, than to have such a discrimination made. It would not only hurt the black children, but it would destroy the means of the education of the white children. It would return many to their homes because it would destroy the public-school system of the South.

As a political question I have never endeavored to treat it; I have endeavored always to view it from the standpoint of education, public-school education.

I am sorry that Senators on this floor here have undertaken to draw distinction between the illiteracy of States and to draw distinctions on the ground of race and color. I am sorry that that has entered into the debate; but I know how hard it is to keep that kind of discussion out of all debates, especially upon a bill like this; but I do appeal to the Republican party to consider what harm they are doing to those they seem to be trying to help. If you make this distinction, you destroy every opportunity they have for education. We are not asking for alms; we are asking for justice. We are not situated like the Senator from Delaware who while he was being taxed for his stamp on matches was making a cent for every cent that he paid out, and we had to buy the matches. I am speaking for a people who pay their taxes without grumbling, and receive nothing in return but good government, the protection of life, liberty, and property, and they would like to have added to them education.

We do not need a navy, so far as certain States are concerned, to protect their cities not located on the Atlantic; yet I am in favor of appropriating money to build a navy, a navy that will put this country in a position at least where it need not be afraid of a threat from Chili. I am ready to vote for it, ready to vote for it out of money that is to come into the Treasury. That which is there we may certainly expend; certainly every Senator on the other side of the Chamber ought to be willing to expend it, for if there be one who did not challenge the Republican party for keeping that money in the Treasury during the last campaign, challenging the Republican party with being the cause of hard times because all that money was kept in the Treasury, I should like him to get up and say so. Now if it is to go out, if according to Democratic doctrine it ought to go out, what better use or better channel of putting it out for the public good than for public education? It is against the Constitution, I am told. It has not been against the Constitution on Democratic theory to make appropriations. I never heard any Democrat refuse them, and very few Republicans do, and those who do are such as have an abundance.

The Knights of Labor, says the gentleman, will be indignant at this appropriation. Why, he does not know who compose the Knights of Labor. They do not allow professional men in their organization; they are laboring men; and while the Senator was warning us of what would become of this country if we did anything that they did not approve, I will tell him that if he keeps up in the line of legislation that he has suggested here to-day, the Knights of Labor will turn upon any Senator from the three counties called Delaware. I believe that the Knights of Labor are law-abiding citizens, and that there is nothing in legislation that would better promote their interests than to devote the surplus fund in the Treasury to-day to the education of their children.

I am for this bill, because I think it does promote the interests of the poor and laboring element of this country. I am for it because I think their children are entitled to an education by this Government, because it is all the Government under the Constitution, in my judgment, can do. It can educate children until they become men capable of taking care of themselves. This Government can do that, and I do not hear anybody denying it except the Senator from Delaware, who says the general-welfare clause will justify you in giving out money for any other purpose but that of free and general education.

The Senator argues that we in the South are better off than they in the North because labor is cheaper. What an anomaly is that, that the cheaper the labor the better the condition of a country? Such a doctrine as that I suppose would make an Irishman happy if he did not know better, by experience, that the cheaper the labor the better off the country is. That is the doctrine, not of the democrat but of the aristocrat. I say, sir, that we are not so well off. But it is not upon that ground alone that I stand here pleading for the passage of this bill. I wish it to be passed by the Republican party since I have heard so much against it from the other side. I wish it could be done by States instead of counties; we do need it, our children need it; and while we are poor, and rich, and proud, we still ask for it. We are poor now; we are rich in undeveloped resources; and we are proud of our history—a history that some States have not. Rich, poor, proud, we ask for it because we need it, and because we think it will do good ultimately, not only to our States but to our whole country.

Mr. HAMPTON. Mr. President, on Friday last in some remarks which were made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] he quoted from the report of the superintendent of education in South Carolina for 1881. I suggested to him that he had fallen into a mistake on account of a typographical error, and I have just received a letter from the present governor of the State who was then the superintendent, calling my attention to the matter. I beg to read it for the information of the Senate:

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA, EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Columbia, March 1, 1886.

MY DEAR SIR: I observe that in the debate on the educational bill, on the 26th ultimo, Senator ALLISON quotes from a printed report of a statement which I made in 1882 before the Committee on Education and Labor, to the effect that the school attendance in this State for the year 1880-'81 was, white 61,339, colored 12,199. This is a mistake. Each year since 1876 the number of colored pupils attending the public schools in South Carolina has been largely in excess of the number of white pupils. The attendance for 1880-'81 was, white 61,330, colored 72,199, making a total of 133,458. My remarks on the occasion referred to were taken down by a stenographer, and I had no opportunity to revise his report before it was published. I am sure that, at the time, I stated the figures correctly. There are other errors, but of less importance than this one, in the report of what I said before the committee, as published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the 10th ultimo.

Yours, very truly,

HUGH S. THOMPSON.

Senator WADE HAMPTON,
Washington, D. C.

I stated, as I afterward showed to the Senator from Iowa, that this was a mere typographical error which had led him into a mistake; and by a reference to the report of the superintendent of education, Mr. Thompson, on the 18th of November, 1881, I find that he states there that the school attendance was, of whites 61,339, and of colored 72,199; and the mistake obviously has occurred by the misprint of the figure "1" for "7;" and in justice to the governor I have read this letter so that it may go into the RECORD.

Now, sir, I do not propose to discuss this bill, for I have already expressed my opinion upon it; but I say in all sincerity and as a friend, an earnest and steadfast friend of public education of all classes, and particularly of the colored children in the South, that I believe that if this amendment prevails it will do more harm to those who are intended to be the special beneficiaries of this bill than any other one thing that could be done. Practically, in my own State, I think it would do no harm as far as the disposition of the school fund is concerned, for by an amendment to the constitution ratified on the 26th of January, 1878, it is directed that the school tax shall be distributed among the several districts and counties in proportion to the number of pupils attending the public schools. The school funds of South Carolina payable last year were a little over $500,000. By an estimate which has been made by a very careful man the proportion of taxes paid by the white people in South Carolina is 97 per cent., leaving the colored people to pay about 3 per cent.; and yet by this constitutional amendment, which was adopted in 1878, the proceeds of all the school funds are divided fairly between the two races, and not only fairly, but as the reports of the various commissioners have shown, the colored children have had the benefit during the last ten years largely in excess of the white children. I regret exceedingly to see any experiment tried which might, from the prejudices produced, do harm if this donation should be made.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the constitutional question involved in this bill, nor do I propose to discuss at any length the policy of the bill; but, in order that my position may not be misunderstood by the people of my own State, I desire to state briefly why I shall vote for the bill as it came from the committee and why I shall not support the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

It is known to many persons in my State that I have not been an enthusiastic supporter of this measure, that I have gravely doubted the policy of the bill; nevertheless the General Assembly of my State in 1883 by joint resolution requested the delegation in Congress to vote for a measure embodying the ideas and principles contained in this bill. I am satisfied that a large majority of the people of my State are in favor of the passage of the bill. I therefore choose to obey their will and to vote for it; but if the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa is adopted I conceive that it would not only defeat the purpose of the bill, but it would have a tendency to injure and impair if not utterly destroy the common-school system in the State of Arkansas.

I can better illustrate this by referring to the manner in which the taxes are collected and distributed there between the two races. The money received for school purposes comes from various sources. We have, in the first place, a levy of 2 mills on all the property in the State for school purposes. This money is distributed to the various districts throughout the State, to the children within the school age, without regard to color. In addition to this, the poll-tax of each county goes to the school fund of that county and is distributed to the various districts. Then each district within the State is allowed to levy a tax of 5 mills. This, however, depends upon a majority vote of the legal electors of the district at their annual school meeting.

This money is not divided between the whites and blacks per capita, as seems to be understood by some of the Senators who have spoken upon this measure, but the constitution and the laws require that there shall be no difference in the distribution of the money. Therefore, the effort is to give the white and the colored a school for the same number of months in each year; that is, if the fund is sufficient to give both a school for six months in the year, then both the whites and blacks have school for that length of time. If there is only sufficient money belonging to the district to give them a school for three months, then white and colored children all have school facilities for three months in the year; but in every instance the colored children are allowed and permitted to attend for the same number of months annually as the white children.

Now, if the bill passes as it comes from the Committee on Education and Labor this system will not be changed in any way whatever. The only effect will be to give the children a longer period in which they can attend school in the year and to give them better teachers. But if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is adopted, which provides that the funds shall be distributed according to the illiteracy of the children between the whites and blacks (and if I understood him correctly he said that the blacks would receive a seventieth to a twentieth for the whites), then the effect would be to give the whites, added to the State fund what they get from this fund, a school say for four or five months in the year, while the colored children would have school for nine or ten months in the year, where each have heretofore had a school of three months.

Does the Senator from Iowa believe that the white people of the State, who pay all the State taxes, would submit to this discrimination against them and in favor of the blacks? Does he believe that it would be right and just and true to promote good faith and good feeling between the blacks and whites in the State of Arkansas or any other State? If an amendment of that character be adopted, discriminating in favor of black children when the State of Arkansas and the white people who have paid all the taxes have been willing to divide fairly with them, the effect would be, as I fear, that the white people in all the districts where they were in the majority would not vote the 5 mills school tax, and the consequence would be that we would not only lose the State fund but we would lose the fund coming from the General Government.

Such would be the effect upon the white people, because they would believe it was an effort and a disposition on the part of the General Government to give the blacks advantages that they did not receive. The effect upon the colored people, as I verily believe, would be simply this: It would make them believe that they were the special and particular wards of the General Government, and all the evils that flowed from the Freedmen's Bureau would speedily follow on the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. I therefore can not support the amendment. It is not because of any prejudice against the blacks, but it is because I honestly and conscientiously believe that the amendment would disturb the kind relations that now exist between the blacks and whites in my own State.

It has been repeatedly said during the debate that this is a gift, a bounty, a donation to the people of the South. If it be a gift, I submit that it ought to be given freely, it ought to be given graciously, or not given at all. If it be a gift it ought not to be coupled with conditions which we believe would disturb the kind relations which exist between our people and which we believe would tend to destroy our school system. If it be a gift, it ought not be coupled with taunts, with epithets of abuse which tend to degrade and humiliate the donees, and therefore destroy the object and purpose for which it is given.

The bill had its origin in the noblest, the purest, and the best sentiment of the Northern people; and I conceive it ought not be made the pretext for crimination or recrimination between different States of this Union, or between different sections of the Union. I believe that if it be given at all it should be given as freely as the water runs, and that we ought not to be made to understand that we are humiliating ourselves in receiving it.

It has also been said as a reason why this measure should not be passed that the white people of the South were in possession of the proceeds of the labor of the colored people for generations, and therefore there was a double obligation upon the whites to support them—this, too, in face of the fact well known that whatever had been accumulated by that colored labor, whatever had been accumulated by the white labor, prior to the war was either destroyed by the fortunes of war or passed into other hands by the process of reconstruction. I say then that these things ought not, as I believe, to be said if the bill is expected to benefit those for whom the fund is given.

I have seen proper to say this much because I have taken a special and a particular interest in the education of all the people of my State. I have earnestly and at all times not only voted but urged others to vote for the full limit that the law allows, the 5-mill taxes. During the time that I had the honor to be governor of the State of Arkansas I took an especial interest to promote the best interests of the colored normal school at Pine Bluff, which is now supported by money appropriated from the State treasury, and which is alone for colored teachers. I have at all times and under all circumstances been the firm friend and advocate of the levy of sufficient taxes to educate every child in the State of Arkansas, both black and white. But when I am asked not only to do this but to vote for an amendment which will discriminate against the white people in the South in favor of the blacks, which will disturb the relations that exist between them to-day, when evil consequences are to follow, to vote for an amendment which I believe will tend to injure the school system of my State, I for one will go no further.

I, therefore, can not vote for the amendment; but, as I said before, if the Senators on the other side of the Chamber will give us a square vote upon the merits of the bill, in obedience to the instructions given me by my State I shall cast my vote for it.

I wish to say one word more. The people of Arkansas, and, as I verily believe, the people of the South, those who favor the passage of this bill, are actuated by the spirit and the motive that they desire every child, both black and white, to have the opportunities for an education. Many of them support it, too, because if they opposed it they would subject themselves to the charge that they were neither willing to educate the colored children nor to permit the people of the North to educate them.

For these reasons I trust that the bill will be given a vote upon its merits. If Senators think that it ought not to pass, then let it be voted down, but do not seek to throw the responsibility on us by attaching amendments to it which we can not, which we ought not, and which I, for one, will not, support.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MITCHELL, of Oregon, in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] expressed the opinion that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa should not be adopted because, as he said, it evinces a settled distrust of the purposes of the States to whom what he calls this donation is to be distributed. He thinks that inasmuch as this is a pure benevolence, a gift, it should be tendered by us as gifts are made by wealthy men who care not how they give, and that to impose any conditions whatever upon the method of distribution is practically an affront, an insult which is to be resented.

Seventy-seven million dollars is a tolerably respectable sum of money; and I have heard no Senator who advocates the bill upon the Democratic side of the Chamber prefer any other reason except that the donation was necessary to enable them to take care of the colored illiterates in their States. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] last week in his very temperate and reasonable speech used this language:

> I find myself placed by this offer, the white people of Mississippi also find themselves placed in this condition: We have in that State a majority of about 180,000 of colored people. Here is an offer made, as we understand it, by the generous people of the North to aid us in educating them. Are we to reject it? Confessedly we are unable to educate them as we ought to. Then the question presents itself to us, my colleague and myself and others representing States in a similar position, are we to reject this offer? It is in that attitude alone that I will consider the question.

If a Senator from any of the Southern States has made any other declaration or preferred any other claim than this, it has escaped my notice. I affirm that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa does exactly that and only that. It proposes to confine the distribution of this money and limit its expenditure for the very specific purpose for which every Senator on that side of the Chamber has declared that the people of the State whom he represents desire it; yet when any attempt is made to so declare, when any effort is made to place in the statute itself a declaration that the money shall be so disposed of, Senator after Senator rises in his place and says that it is an affront, that it is an insult, that it evinces a settled distrust of the honor and the good faith of the States which under the bill are to receive $60,000,000 out of the $77,000,000 that are to be distributed.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. The Senator did not understand me as saying that it was an affront?

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir, I did not. I understood the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] to say so, and I understood the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY] to say that any attempt to devote the greater portion of this money to the education of the colored people in Arkansas would result in the destruction of the common-school system in that State; that it would utterly destroy the good feeling which he says now prevails among the whites and the blacks; and that if there is in the bill any declaration that it is the desire and the purpose of those who vote this $77,000,000 for that purpose to so utter it in the law itself the white people of Arkansas will regard it as such a declaration as will justify them in resorting to the old relations between the blacks and the whites and destroying the public-school system in that State.

What are we to understand by these declarations, sir? What do they mean? On what is the public-school system in Arkansas founded, if, when we are called upon to vote this enormous sum of money, we are told that to distribute it in accordance with the laws of that State will be such an affront, such an insult to the white people of Arkansas, that they will only send their own children to school four months in the year, whereas the colored children will go nine or ten months?

Mr. BERRY. I beg the Senator's pardon; I hope he does not intend to misrepresent me. I did not say that such would be the effect if the money was distributed according to the laws of the State. I said that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa was adopted, then the result would be to give the colored children, under the present laws of Arkansas, schools for nine or ten months while the white children would have schools for only four or five months under the bill.

Mr. INGALLS. Is there any distinction under the laws of Arkansas as to the school period for white and colored children?

Mr. BERRY. There is not.

Mr. INGALLS. Then how can the distribution of this money upon the basis of the illiteracy of the white and colored children have any effect upon the school period in every year? Is there anywhere in this country elsewhere a stupor so Bœotian; is there elsewhere an intelligence so dense, so impenetrable, and so opaque; is there anywhere else a mental vision of such obliquity as to claim that the language of this amendment, if applied under the laws of the State of Arkansas, will reduce the period for the whites in every school year to four months and increase the school period for the blacks to ten months? I trust not, sir; and I should be glad if some Senator who thinks it is an affront, an insult, in providing for the distribution of $77,000,000 from the Treasury, to provide that it shall be distributed in proportion to the illiteracy of the population, will describe wherein that insult consists, wherein it prevents the white people of any State from appropriating as much money as they please, from fixing their school period at as many months as they please, and expending whatever proportion of their revenues they see fit to distribute in the education of the illiterates within that State within the school age, no matter what their color may be.

No, Mr. President, the purposes and designs and intentions of the supporters of this bill are being gradually developed. They do not propose to have any limitation placed on this fund; they intend to take it and disburse it just as they please. One after another rises here in his place and says, if you declare in this bill exactly in accordance with what its advocates have announced is the purpose, you affront the lofty-souled and high-spirited men who openly confess that they are unable to educate their own illiterates, who come here not as suppliants, because that has been disavowed, not as men asking alms, because that has been repudiated, but as men who are willing to accept a gift. A lofty attitude! "We do not ask anything; we are able to take care of our own affairs; we can educate our own illiterates; we are not mendicants; we are not beggars; we are not asking alms; we are willing to accept a gift; but the gift must be freely offered, without conditions, and we must be allowed to do precisely as we please with it; we do not propose to allow this gift-horse to be looked at in the mouth!"

I think the debate has disclosed the fact that if this money is to be distributed in accordance with the objects and purposes of those who have framed the bill, the more we throw safeguards about it the better, the more we declare emphatically what we intend to be done with it the better; for I observe that the greater proportion of this money is to be distributed under the direction and control of the Secretary of the Interior. If you examine the framework of the bill you will see that the Secretary of the Interior is the officer who is to have the control of this disbursement.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Is that changed by the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. INGALLS. It is not. The entire framework of the bill is based upon the idea that the Secretary of the Interior is to have the disbursement of this money. To him reports are to be made; and whenever a question arises as to the right of any State or Territory to receive money under its disbursement, to him and to his law officers is the appeal to be made.

Fortunately we have some light on the purposes, we have some insight into the views of the Secretary of the Interior on this great subject. We are not without illumination; and it is very fortunate that before this bill is passed we are enabled to show from his affirmative acts, by the selection that he has made of the law officer of his Department, what are the views, what are the purposes, what are the ideas that animate the Secretary of the Interior with regard to the common-school system of this country.

The Assistant Attorney-General of the United States, who has been selected as the law adviser of the Secretary of the Interior, and who is now acting in that capacity in that Department, who has been there for six or eight months with the approval and concurrence of the Secretary of the Interior, is a gentleman named Zach Montgomery, now, or late, of California, before whom will come all the questions of law that may arise under the construction of the bill, before whom all questions of legal interpretation are to come for decision. He is not without a witness as to his opinion on the subject of common schools in this country. I hold in my hand an acknowledged publication of his upon this subject; and that there may be no doubt or dispute as to the authenticity of this work I announce that he sent me a copy of it himself with an autographic note declaring that it expressed his convictions and asking me to give it my careful consideration.

Mr. COCKRELL. What is the title?

Mr. INGALLS. It is entitled "Drops from the Poison Fountain"—the words "the Poison Fountain" being in quotation marks—"Facts that are Stranger than Fiction, by Zach Montgomery, of the California Bar;" and that is followed by the very singular invocation: "Read first and condemn afterward," as if it was inevitable that it should be condemned, but that he desired it should first be read.

Copies of this pamphlet will be sent postage paid to any part of the United States for the following prices, in advance, either in money-orders or currency, by registered letter addressed to J. J. Montgomery, Oakland, Cal., box 233.

Published at "Oakland, Cal., 1879." The date is immaterial, because, as I say, he has within two days sent me a copy of the pamphlet avowing it to be his own, and the sentiments contained in it he reasserts and reiterates. He begins:

The writer intends to offer no apology to the reading community for the publication of this book. As soon would he think of apologizing to the slumbering inhabitants of a city in flames for attempting to disturb their rest by the vigorous ringing of a fire-bell. Far better that they awake in anger than to awake not at all.

I skip.

We promise to prove that our boasted New England public-school system, as now by law established throughout the length and breadth of the American Republic, is a poisonous fountain, fraught with the seeds of human misery and moral death.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. INGALLS. Well, I will allow the Senator if he desires; but what does the Senator desire?

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I simply desire to make an inquiry as to whether it is not possible that Zach, having made that declaration in the book, and knowing it was there, sent the Senator two copies because he knew the Senator from Kansas was against the public-school bill?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Kansas did not receive two copies of the work.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. I understood you to say so.

Mr. INGALLS. The one in my hand was obtained from the Congressional Library, and I was entirely familiar with what it contained long before I received the additional copy. The Senator from Virginia jumps before he reaches the stile.

Mr. RIDDLEBERGER. Did you not receive the last copy after you made your speech against the public-school bill?

Mr. INGALLS. I proceed with the expression of the views of Mr. Montgomery:

Adhering to the proposition with which we set out a moment ago, namely, that the people properly educated are more moral, virtuous, contented, happy, and law-abiding than an uneducated people, would you not be forced to the conclusion that there must be something wrong, terribly, radically wrong, in a system of education so much more direful in its results than even illiteracy itself?

The author then proceeds to give tables of statistics for the purpose of showing that public-school education is accompanied by more criminals, by more suicides, by a greater proportion of deaths resulting from degrading diseases than are communities where the common-school system does not prevail; and he proceeds to say:

One very noticeable fact in this connection, as shown by the foregoing tables, is that in the State of Massachusetts, which claims the honor of being the founder of the New England system of education, while she had by far the smallest proportion of illiterate native-born adults of any, even of the New England States, had at the same time much the largest proportion of native white criminals, she having 1 criminal to every 649 native white inhabitants.

That is his view of the results of the common-school system of education. Upon page 12 he proceeds:

And this precious system of education is the great boon for which in 1870 the American people were paying to the tune of $64,030,673, while at the same time they were grinding through this mill of moral death no less than 6,228,000 children.

In speaking about the relations of California to this system he says:

Indeed, so infatuated has our young State become with this crime and pauper breeding system of public instruction, that she has made it a penal offense for the parent or guardian of any child between the ages of eight and fourteen years to keep such child from the public school. * * * Thus it is that the votaries of this system have absolutely undertaken, by the most tyrannical legislation, to strip every parent of the guardianship of his children. * * * So that if these school directors choose to appoint a libertine or a harlot as the tutor of your daughters, and at the same time refuse their gracious permission for you to send them to a private school of your own choice, it is with fines or prison dungeons that the law proposes to reward you, should you, in obedience to the dictates of right, reason, and your own conscience, seek to shield them from the contaminating touch of the vile teacher? Is it any wonder that vice flourishes or that virtue perishes under the influence of such a system?

Upon page 17 he proceeds:

Let any one who doubts the general ignorance of our people on this last subject—

That is, the criminal effect of the public-school system—

test the matter. * * * The truth is that the advocates of this New England system have been so long, so loud, and so persistent in proclaiming to the world its supposed excellences that nine-tenths of the world have, without the least investigation, concluded to accept it for all that its most enthusiastic admirers represent it to be. Were it not for the widespread and almost total ignorance on the part of parents as regards the poisonous and deathly fruits which they and their children and society at large are daily reaping from this anti-parental system of education, it could not survive a single month in its present shape.

On page 19 he says—and I am merely picking out the jewels; all is gem-bearing strata, but I pick out the prominent jewels that appear in the course of this production—

Perhaps, though, we shall be told that so radical a change in the public-school system as that suggested would work the destruction of the system itself. If that be so, then we would ask whether it is better for us to destroy the system, or to let the system destroy us?

Here is another delightful definition of the common-school system and its effects upon society as understood by Mr. Zach Montgomery, Assistant Attorney-General for the Department of the Interior, by whom this common-school money is to be disbursed and by whom questions of law and interpretation are to be decided under this bill!

Should anybody, in making such an estimate, find the profits exceedingly small in proportion to the investment, let him not convert that fact into an argument against education itself, but only against this anti-parental system of education—

a system which, being conceived in crime, brought forth in crime, and nurtured in crime, must, of necessity, propagate crime.

Mr. Montgomery has republished this volume with additions, decorations, enlargements, and amendments, in a volume which I hold in my hand, presented by the author to the Library of Congress, entitled somewhat epigrammatically upon the exterior in a diamond-shaped diagram, "Sixty to one. Why is it? Inquire within." It contains some speeches that were made by Hon. Zach Montgomery, Assistant Attorney-General of the Department of the Interior, to whom the provisions of the Blair bill for education in the South are to be submitted for consideration and for being rendered effectual, which I should be glad, did time permit, to read; but I pass on to one other relation which Mr. Zach Montgomery bears to this subject. Section 10 declares:

That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used only for common schools, not sectarian in character.

That means, I suppose, that they are not to be under the control of any religious sect; that religious instruction, it may be, is to be excluded from them.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Sectarian instruction.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sectarian-religious instruction. Mr. Zach Montgomery, Assistant Attorney-General for the Department of the Interior, appears to have some very pronounced views on the subject of sectarian education. He evidently is a very loquacious man. On the 6th day of July, 1873, Mr. Zach Montgomery, not then Assistant Attorney-General for the Department of the Interior, delivered a speech before the Roman Catholic Sunday-school teachers in California, which was reprinted in pamphlet form for distribution by his admirers and friends. It obtained a quite extensive circulation, and it so happened that copies found their way as far eastward as the Atlantic coast.

I hold in my hand a report of the speech that was delivered by Mr. Zach Montgomery upon that occasion; and I must be just to him to here declare that he states in a card published in the New York Tribune, either in July or August of the past year, that the pamphlet report of the speech he delivered on the 6th day of July, 1873, was garbled and imperfect. He admits that he made the speech; he does not deny that he entertains the sentiments imputed to him; but he says that the statement was garbled and imperfect, and in his card to the Tribune he recites the paragraphs that he says misrepresent him in that report, and those I shall omit or indicate in the reading that I now propose hastily to make. He does not deny that he entertains the sentiments that are attributed to him in the obnoxious paragraphs, but he affirms that the language is imperfect, and that it does not fully express his views on these subjects. He begins:

Being brought into the presence of so august a body and surrounded by so beautiful an audience I feel embarrassed with a sense of inability to do justice to the subject before me. In case I should commit an unknown error I would ask his grace to absolve me, as I do not know it. Obedience, as you all know, is the crowning act of faith.

Here follows a paragraph that he says does not express the views that he avowed on that occasion; it is in the following language:

I therefore relinquish all preference or desire of my own, and obey the commands of the high political authority of the Church.

He says that sentiment as therein expressed was garbled and imperfect, although he does not state what his language was. But he continues in language that he does not deny:

I deem it the highest station in life to teach the young Catholics the principles of the only Church on the face of the earth—that is, the Holy Roman Catholic Church. The notion the Protestant element entertain about the great progress made in the nineteenth century I wish to warn you to abstain from.

Now follows another paragraph, that he says was incorrectly reported, in this language:

Inroads made by the telegraph, steamboat, railroad, and the printing-press upon our Church are almost irreparable.

He says he did not say that in those words; but he continues in language that he does not deny, having the pamphlet before him, in the card that he published in the New York Tribune for the purpose of denouncing the injustice done to him by the publication of this pamphlet:

They are the means of spreading false rumors and immoral sentiments that corrupt the minds and lives of good Catholics in this far-off land.

Mr. DAWES. Does he admit that he said that?

Mr. INGALLS. He does not deny it. He had the pamphlet before him and denied the preceding sentence in the words I have read, but he does not deny anything that I have not declared that he did deny, and I shall do him the justice in my reading to omit everything that he declares imperfectly represented his sentiments. After going on with a screed about the telegraphic news that comes from Europe and is not important, he says:

But, my friends, you have a higher sphere of usefulness than encouraging the youth to read such corrupting papers. Teach them the holy principles of the Church, and that will save you and them, too, from the whirlpool of Protestantism and heresy in all its forms. A pastor is like a watchman on a house-top. He sees the storm coming, and he warns you. * * * Now, my friends in the Cross, the great secret civil-service corps was established in the holy city of Rome about 1,800 years ago. Some of my audience know where to get instructions about it.

Here follows a paragraph that he says in his card in the New York Tribune did him an injustice and he did not say it in those words:

Obey your pastor and look to him for all your knowledge, both civil and religious. Roman Catholics are persecuted on all sides, in hotels, restaurants, and other places of common resort, by sneers, jeers, and contemptible expressions about the leading Catholics, and eating meat on Friday. Be patient—

He says—

Be patient, and organize yourselves for the day of action. The Protestant theory of independence—

And he does not deny this, Mr. President—

The Protestant theory of independence, making up our minds for ourselves on matters in general, is false, as well as damnable in the extreme. There is no such a thing as personal freedom in religion and morality; the whole power lies with the successor of Saint Peter, Holy Pio Nono, at the holy city of Rome. Look to your leader and he will take care of you.

Your secretary states that more teachers are wanted. A shepherd would not leave his flock at the mercy of the wolves; so I beseech you not to go to the heretics to get the required teachers. Your pastors try to please you, but they can not go beyond the limits prescribed to them by their superiors.

In this country we have Catholic teachers in the public schools; they teach the doctrines of our holy faith. But they are prevented by the laws.

Now something occurs that he says in his card in the Tribune was an injustice:

Now, for the present, they can whisper in the ear of the scholar at times and tell them how, when, and where they can obtain absolution from their sins. The institutions of this country must be made the institutions of the Church.

That, he says, should be stricken out. He did not say that the following sentence should be stricken out, which reads:

And then our Sunday-schools and the so-called public schools will be one. The common schools of this country—

Now, mark what Mr. Zach Montgomery, of California, said about the public schools of this country in a speech delivered before a Sabbath-school assembly:

The common schools of this country are nothing more nor less than so many schools for teaching the young scandal and wrong-doing. I am told by good authority that it is almost impossible to make Christians of the children who attend the public schools. It is high time something was done to correct this evil, and I here venture to say—

Says this man who is to have control of all legal questions arising under a non-sectarian system of public-school education in this country—

And I here venture to say if the Roman Catholics do not stand up for their rights they fail to do their duty.

One paragraph more, he says, should have been omitted, in the following words:

And one of the refuges we have is in the miracle of Most Holy Father at Rome.

Omitting that, the paragraph stands:

Among the persecutors we find the Protestants, the heathens, and the Jews.

Then an omission.

Who will deliver us from all harm and absolve us if we do our duty to the last?

Mr. COKE. I ask the Senator from Kansas what was the date of that address?

Mr. INGALLS. The date of the address was the 6th day of July, 1873, but in July or August, 1885, twelve years afterward, Mr. Zach Montgomery, having obtained possession of a pamphlet containing this report from which I have read, published a card in the New York Tribune, not denying that he made the speech, but only declaring that the paragraphs to which I have called attention and have omitted in my reading were improperly reported and did him injustice. With the entire speech before him he avowed and reiterated and once more assumed for himself all the opinions that were there expressed, except the five paragraphs that he declared in words ought, in justice to him, to be omitted from the publication to which I have referred.

Mr. President, as I have said, this bill is to be under the control of the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior has selected as his law adviser a man who entertains and avows the opinions that I have read. They have not been spoken in a corner; they have been publicly declared and reaffirmed within the present week. If there be any Senator who supports the bill who desires that this money shall be directed in the channel of free, common-school, public education as we have it, and in the direction of non-sectarian education, then I say that so long as the interpretation and control is thus to be left I think there can be no doubt that the more safeguards we throw about it and the more emphatic and minute and explicit we are in our directions as to how this money shall be applied the greater assurance we shall have that it will reach its destination.

Mr. BLAIR obtained the floor.

Mr. BERRY. Will the Senator from New Hampshire yield to me or one moment?

Mr. BLAIR. Very well.

Mr. BERRY. I was simply going to state that I think the Senator from Kansas misunderstood what I said in regard to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. The Senator from Iowa, as I understood him in his speech, stated that if his amendment was adopted the colored children would get, say, $3.50 under this appropriation where the whites would get $1. I said that in my State, where we had a sufficient amount of money in the district, we furnished all the colored children and all the white children in the district a school of three months in the year; that if this amendment was adopted the effect would be when this was added to the fund raised by the State, that the $1 per capita would probably give the whites an additional month, say four or five months, and that the $3.50 added to the colored schools would give the colored children a school, say, of nine or ten months. That was the statement I made.

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. President, this Mr. Zach Montgomery would be of the very slightest importance in the practical administration of this fund; but there is one further fact that the Senator from Kansas failed to state in regard to Mr. Zach Montgomery, which no man knows better than he, who is himself second on the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the cases of such men as Mr. Zach Montgomery are referred for action by the Senate before their official prerogative or station is secured, and that is, that Mr. Zach Montgomery is not yet confirmed, and this whole matter is entirely in the control of the chairman of the committee [Mr. EDMUNDS], or Mr. INGALLS, who comes second to him upon the Committee on the Judiciary, or Mr. MCMILLAN, Mr. HOAR, Mr. WILSON of Iowa, Mr. EVARTS, Mr. PUGH, Mr. COKE, Mr. VEST, and Mr. JACKSON. So far as that part of it is concerned, it is of very trifling consequence one way or the other.

Mr. Zach Montgomery has some reputation as a lawyer, and in the construction of this bill, if it should become a law, he would be unquestionably, if a conscientious and proper man, likely to construe the statute in accordance with the principles of law. To guard against any danger of that kind—for I will assure the honorable Senator from Kansas that there is danger that this bill will become a law, and be primarily subject to the administration of the Interior Department—I will suggest to him that in the discharge of his duty as a member of the Committee on the Judiciary he take good care to protect the common schools of this country and of these States by the rejection of a man who avows sentiments of so atrocious a character as does Mr. Zach Montgomery, if he is properly chargeable with the utterances which have been stated on this floor. I would look upon such a man as a worse enemy to the country than the arch-fiend himself. We are on guard against that sort of influence.

Mr. Zach Montgomery is but a subordinate at the best, if he were confirmed. The Secretary of the Interior is a gentleman who in the last Congress and for several preceding Congresses WAS a member of this body, and no man made abler speeches or expressed more liberal sentiments in support of this bill and in vindication of the general principles of the common-school system. He is the superior of all his assistant secretaries or his assistant attorneys-general; and in his last report, which was also his first, he says to us in regard to this very bill, which he supported in the last Congress, referring to the report of the Commissioner of Education, which touched upon this subject:

I have been unable, for want of time, to present even a brief of the views and recommendations therein set forth, the greater part of which meet my concurrence, especially his renewed invocation of Federal aid to insure adequate provision for the instruction of the freedmen of the South, and also his recommendation that some measure of Federal aid be extended to public primary education, based on the number of illiterates in the various States as shown by the Tenth Census.

That is the gentleman who will have the practical administration of this measure as far as any national officer will have it. But the primary duties of the Secretary of the Interior in the administration of the law would be chiefly those of computation. Before the bill, if it should become a law, could go into operation the governors or the authorities of the various States must file a report with the Secretary of the Interior showing that they have complied with the preliminary requirements of the measure. Having, by doing this, entitled themselves to the distribution of the first year's appropriation, which is only $7,000,000, it is then paid over as a matter of necessity in the discharge of a mere executory function to the authorities of the States, to be by them paid out in the States in connection with their own school system and as a part of their own school fund, distributed precisely as though it had been originally their own money, in such a way as to give to every child of school age within their jurisdiction an equalization of opportunities for common-school education. At the end of the first year the authorities of the States are to report to the Secretary of the Interior, and through him to the Senate and House of Representatives, what they have done with this money and with their own, treating the whole as one common fund; and if in their expenditure they have failed to so appropriate or apportion the money as to give an equalization of school privileges in the use of the whole to all children of school age, regardless of color, with no distinction of race, they are not entitled to any further appropriation under the provisions of the bill, and nothing is to be done but to withhold it, or to make such further requirements as the wisdom of Congress may dictate.

Every year's apportionment requires a yearly appropriation. There is the opportunity of the fullest investigation by Congress of all parts of the country where there may be complaint. Nobody is restricted in any school district throughout the country in making known a grievance that may have arisen to him or to any other under the operations of the bill. We all know how almost the primary power of a Legislature is that of investigation. It is perhaps the primary power. Ability to learn of grievances is indispensable prior to legislation for the redress of grievances. That great power of investigation is recognized in the bill, and if there were no recognition of it, it is a constitutional and inherent power, which we should exercise in this as in all other cases.

Beyond that, the Secretary of the Interior himself is charged with the same duty, and to him will come the complaint from the humblest in the land, and he is obliged by the provisions of the bill, and in the discharge of his sworn duty, to see that there be no abuse arising under its administration.

So we have provided in the administration of the law through our national executive officers, in the practical administration of the law by the authorities of the States in all the States, and by the authorities of the Territories in all the Territories, and then by reserving to ourselves in express terms a right which we would have under any circumstances by Congress—in all three directions we have been more than usually careful to provide that there shall be no injury done to the public or to the child. The Treasury is as well guarded as it can be. I do not believe it is possible to throw around this enactment and around the public money which we are proposing to apportion for the benefit of the common schools and the common-school children of the country any stronger safeguards than are already in the bill.

I do not wish to make any speech—I have said enough; but I wish to place in the possession of the Senate a letter which I have just received, dated last Saturday, after the debates of the week and after the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa had been discussed and its true nature understood. It is a letter which was sent to me from the clergymen of this city, who represent the colored race here, and who by their intelligence and their interest in the subject I think may well be considered as the proper representatives of the race throughout the country. I have no doubt that matter of this kind would come from the entire country were the subject understood and were there time. The letter is addressed to me, and is as follows:

As colored ministers, identified by blood and lineage with the black race, we feel the deepest interest in the problem of education in the Southern States.

That interest is deepened and intensified just now by the consideration of the bill now pending in Congress for the extension of Government aid for national education.

We see by the Congressional reports that the passage of that bill is somewhat endangered by proposals which are causing much diversity of opinion.

We feel as much interested in the collateral points suggested in the Senate as the honorable gentlemen who propose them; but so deep is our anxiety for the passage of the bill itself that we venture the expression of our opinion as colored men that its failure would be a disaster to the whole country, especially to the black race. We advocate the equitable distribution of the funds as set forth in the bill.

We further add an opinion that there are some ills which it would be better for the race to suffer than by the failure of the bill for the people to be left to grope on for years in the deep darkness of their present ignorance and benightedness.

We are, yours, very truly,

There has been at least some confusion by the friends of the amendment now pending offered by the Senator from Iowa as to the interpretations which should properly be placed on the amendment. Since the discussion last week I have applied myself once more to the census, and I have figured the thing out mathematically according to the returns of the census and the other data we have in this case. Assuming that this proposed system of white and colored schools should be extended so as to include all the children of school age in the States where the system prevails, and that of course is what is contemplated as the ultimate effect and operation of the bill and of the pending amendment, assuming, I say, that both races are gathered in the schools, the white in the white schools and the colored in the colored schools, then the results which I shall state will take place, bearing in mind, and I wish this to be considered in connection with the fact that the constitution and laws of every one of the States now require the local taxation to be applied to the benefit of all the children who may be gathered in the schools, without regard to race or color; so that by existing law in these States an equal distribution of school privileges is already provided for. Assuming that to be so, and preserving that status, the theory of the bill is to pour into those States a sufficiency of money to nearly double the length of their existing schools, and of such further schools as it may be necessary to establish in order to include the entire school population.

With this as the existing status, the amendment comes in and provides that in the State of Alabama this money shall be so distributed as to give as often as there is $1 given to a white child—not to the white race, but to the white child, who is in need of education just like the colored child, no more, no less—as often as $1 is given to him, to give to the colored child $3; in Arkansas as often as the white child will get $1 the colored child will get $3; in Delaware as often as the white child gets $1 the colored child gets $6; in Florida as often as the white child gets $1 the colored child gets $3; in Georgia as often as the white child gets $1 the colored child gets $3; in Kentucky the white child $1 and the colored child $4; in Louisiana the white child $1, the colored child $4; in Maryland the white child $1, the colored child $5; in Mississippi the white child $1, the colored child $4; in Missouri the white child $1, the colored child $5; in North Carolina the white child $1, the colored child $2; in South Carolina the white child $1, the colored child $3; in Tennessee the white child $1, the colored child $4; in Texas the white child $1, the colored child $4; in Virginia the white child $1, the colored child $4; and in West Virginia the white child $1, and the colored child $3, thus establishing by the terms of the bill a most apparent and, as I think, a most hurtful discrimination, and a discrimination especially hurtful to the colored race themselves.

Its inevitable tendency must be to excite prejudices toward them on the part of their white associates, people double their own in number, owning already at least nine-tenths, probably ninety-five one-hundredths, I presume even more than 95 per cent. of the property, and a prejudice exceedingly hurtful to them during the period of the administration of the bill. Then further, we should instruct them by this national action that the negro is our special ward, and relieve them from the pressure of the duty upon their consciences to take care of the colored men who are with them, who are their laborers and their producers.

We make them the wards of the nation in a more complete sense than is the Indian to-day, and when, at the end of eight years, this bill ceases to operate, the appropriations under it having run down to a merely nominal sum when we consider the increase of population, so that its failure to be distributed the year following will be felt as inconsiderable, the school system meanwhile having improved, wealth increased, and the States become more able to bear taxation—at that period of time we should leave this colored race, entirely dependent, while of property they would have made themselves comparatively no large increase. At present they are wholly unable to bear taxation and do not bear the taxation which affords them anything like a twentieth of the school facilities which they enjoy. Where then would be the colored race; and shall we not have instructed the white race that they have no interest in them?

I do not look at this from the standpoint of the Senators on the other side who advocate this bill and say they are willing to take it. I do not recognize Senators who give expression simply to their sentiments as really representative of the necessities of the people. I do not blame those Senators for failing to express themselves in any way that expresses personal or State humiliation. That can not be expected; but there is behind them a strong desire on the part of the common people, white and black, for this assistance, not because it is assistance, but because it gives them the capacity to be the equal of any other Americans, that their institutions may be homogeneous with ours, that their capacity to produce, that their level of civilization may be the same as the common school has given us at the North and throughout the West. They hunger and thirst for it, and were I a representative of that population on this floor, if it were necessary I would implore for this money on account of the need of my people, but as a representative of another population on this side of the Chamber, I would never taunt those who are too proud, perhaps too justly proud, to come here in the attitude of those who solicit. I vote for this because it is as important for me in New Hampshire that the child of Louisiana or of Mississippi or of South Carolina be educated as it is for the child of New Hampshire. There is the same danger involved to our institutions in the election of a President or any other national officer by the ignorant votes of California or of South Carolina or of Maine, and you can not draw the distinction any more than you can separate the waters of the country, any more than you can draw geographical lines which will separate the waters of the Mississippi. We are all one and no matter where it is located the danger should be removed and must be removed by national power.

Now, sir, this amendment destroys this bill, and we have to select to-day whether we will defeat this bill or defeat this amendment. There can be no question about it. We understand the natural feelings of Senators on the other side. No human being believes that the bill with this amendment in it can go through the House of Representatives, or receive the signature of the President, and we have to make our election whether everything shall be precisely as we should like it, including taunts over the past and embodied in the legislation of the country, or whether we will pass a bill which we have ourselves passed by the almost unanimous action of the Republicans and a very large proportion of the Democrats in a former Congress; a bill which contains no feature of distribution which has not been in every bill proposing national aid of the twenty that may have been and there are very nearly that number which have been introduced into Congress during the last fifteen years. Every one of them undertook to distribute in precisely the same way that this bill does. There is no new feature in it. There is nothing here that the honorable Senator from Vermont, or from Kansas, or from Iowa is not entirely familiar with in the matter of distribution. They have thought this over, they have considered this, and year after year they have indorsed the principles of distribution contained in this bill, and it is pretty late to think of interjecting here now a principle which can have, as any intelligent man knows, no other effect but the final and, perhaps, the everlasting defeat of this measure.

I will take the liberty of putting the table, from which I read and which contains the data and calculation leading to the conclusion, into the RECORD.

RACE DISCRIMINATION PROPOSED IN THE ALLISON AMENDMENT.

Distribution in the States where there are white and colored schools of their proportion of $7,000,000 to white and colored children of school age in such States, in the proportion that the number of white and colored persons ten years of age and upward who can not write bear to each other by the census of 1880.

I will now read section 8 of a bill which has been introduced by the former Secretary of the Interior, now the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, Senate bill 152, proposing national aid, to give $10,000,000, I think, the first year. The eighth section of that bill passes on the question of distribution, and with reading it I close what little I have to say:

SEC. 8. That in such States or Territories as shall maintain separate schools for white and colored children the money so apportioned shall be divided according to the respective number of such white and colored children in such State or Territory.

Precisely the provision of the bill under discussion.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I suppose that if there can be such a thing as committing members of a political party or a political party to any measure, the Republican party is committed to the policy of this bill. I do not of course suppose that any Senator or legislator is bound by any expression of opinion or purpose or desire in the past to anything which, according to the best light that is shed upon the present moment, seems to him of evil policy or influence. Every Republican President who has taken the executive chair since the close of the war—Grant, Hayes, Garfield, Arthur, the last three national Republican conventions, and the Republican conventions in most of the Northern States—have united in calling upon Congress to go to the verge of constitutional power in extending the aid of the nation to the common-school systems of the South.

There are three things, and three things only, which make up the Republican policy, upon which all Republicans are agreed; three things in which the Republican party must live or bear no life; three things inextricably blended together upon which our national life itself must depend; and they are, absolute freedom of the ballot, universality of common-school education, and the maintenance and elevation of the workingman's wages. They are three things dependent upon each other. Not one of this sublime trinity can fail or perish and either of the other two survive.

Now, of course this measure is subject, and should be subject, to every criticism, to every amendment, to every improvement which the ingenuity of any Senator can suggest. It is entitled certainly to a respect which it has not received at the hands of every Senator who has mingled in this debate, if it be true, as the Senator from New Hampshire has stated without contradiction, that it has received the support just as it stands of a Republican caucus of Senators in the last Congress, and that its details were adjusted by a committee composed of some of the ablest representatives of that party then in this Chamber. Of course, nobody claims, as my honorable friend from Iowa very well said, that this is binding on the conscience or judgment of any individual Senator further than perhaps to require him to approach the consideration of the bill with some degree of respect and some degree of anxiety to conform, it may be, individual to the general judgment.

The principle of this bill—and I only rise to speak two or three minutes about it—seems to me not to have been entirely understood. Some Senators from wealthy and populous States, able to take care and proud to take care of their own common-school system from their own resources, said that their States need no bounty from the National Government; that Massachusetts, Iowa, or some other State would spurn and should spurn anything like charity. Why, Mr. President, this is the money of the American people, raised by the American people, paid in by the American people, owned by the American people, and expended by the American people.

When Massachusetts receives one hundred or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year from this bill it is not a gift of money, it is merely a diminution or subtraction from the amount of her tax for this purpose, because of the four times that amount which Mississippi will get in any year Massachusetts is to pay four times as much as Mississippi, at least in the way of taxes. But, instead of drawing an arbitrary line at a certain point of illiteracy from the census, or by Mason and Dixon's line, or the line of the old slave States, or the line of the States that went into rebellion, or in any other way, it was conceived that on the whole the best way was to distribute this money on a more national and general principle, just as if we were about to build light-houses on the coast. Massachusetts and Rhode Island before the Constitution was formed, generations ago, built all the light-houses they needed from their own resources, or at any rate all but one or two.

We say we will have a system of light-houses to be expended in proportion among the different States to the size of the exposed coast and the needs of commerce in that place; and that is all. This is therefore not a gift to the States who receive less than their proportion and pay more than their proportion. It is to those States only and merely a diminution of the weight of a tax; and of course that they must understand, and I think they do understand.

Now, Mr. President, the purpose of this bill is this, and it is a very simple one, and after twenty years' discussion in the press and the pulpit, at the meetings of educators and in both branches of Congress, it is the best one as it seems to me which anybody yet has been able to devise; and that is to say to the States of the Union "we will find out what sum of money is necessary, in addition to the sums which are raised or can be raised from your own resources, to furnish in every State a fair and equal common-school education to every child of the school age, and we will distribute in proportion to illiteracy a certain sum of money to be raised from the national Treasury, but you must undertake from your own resources, as a condition of this grant, to supply everything else that is needed to secure a sufficient common-school education the advantages of which are to be open to every child within your borders, without any distinction of race or color."

Then comes in my honorable friend from Iowa, and he introduces an amendment which requires—as much as if it were written in those words, as it seems to me—and I have given it all the care and reflection which a proposition from so eminent an authority deserves—the States that are to receive this bounty at the South to make themselves in their own expenditures a distinction in favor of their white children, and that is the whole of it and the whole operation of it as it seems to me. Nobody will deny that if you have got, as this bill requires you to have in four or five different places, a system sufficient to give an ample and reasonable common-school education to every child, then the expenditures should be equal. It is true that the negro child represents a race which has been in barbarism and in slavery for uncounted centuries. It is true that the white child represents a race whose predecessors have raised it to the highest pitch of human civilization and human culture and enlightenment. But when those two children are put side by side in the school to stay, or put in separate schools side by side, which schools are to be exactly alike in all respects, is it not going to cost just as much per child to give a common-school education to the child of the poor man as to the child of the rich man? The rich man may send his children elsewhere. That we do not want; we want all the children in the common school between the school ages; but when the children are there the same number of hours, the same number of lessons, the same number of teachers, the same school-books, and the same rules and discipline are to be extended alike to both, and it makes no difference whether one comes from a race of princes and the other comes from a race of slaves.

That being the case you send a million dollars into Mississippi, and you give that whole million dollars to the blacks, every dollar of it, we will suppose, and what follows? It follows that to have an equal and just and reasonable common-school system in the State of Mississippi, under which all the children fare alike without distinction of race or color, the authorities of the State of Mississippi must subtract, and justly should subtract, a million dollars from the grant which they were before making to their colored children and add it to the grant to the white children, and then the two children are alike; and when this bill ends, as the Senator from New Hampshire has very well observed, at the end of eight years you have got fifteen or sixteen States in this country trained to keeping up a distinction, not merely in the disposition of these gifts but in the disposition of all the moneys raised by the States, between their white and their colored children, and you have got to revise and reconstruct and quarrel about their whole matters of the expenditure of money and of school administration in order to set that right.

It appears to me that my honored friend from Iowa—yet it is a pretty audacious thing I know to say about so clear-headed and able a man—seems to make a confusion between the needs of a race. Here are 50,000 colored children who need everything, here are 5,000 white children who need nothing, or here are 5,000 white children needing help to the 50,000 of the other, and he says must not your money go to the children who need it most? The occasion for this grant is that you have this new body of children needing expenditure for education cast upon the community in certain States. If that is the need of your expenditure, why do you not apply your expenditure where the need exists? Well, if you were intending and meaning to remedy the whole evil that would be true; if you were talking about how much should be expended for 5,000 whites, or how much should be expended for 50,000 colored children, that would be true; but here you have a proposition the fundamental and express condition of which, asserted and reasserted and reiterated in this bill, is that the States are to add to what you put in their hands enough to put all these children on a condition of substantial and absolute equality.

Apply it to the State of Massachusetts and the State of Maine, which provide for the children, home-born and foreign-born, alike. They provide for the Irish child, for the child of the Canadian-Frenchman, for the Scandinavian, for the German the same school system that they provide for their own children, and some of these children are descended from races where probably there has not been an ancestor who could read and write since Noah came out of the Ark. And yet we do not say that because in a certain ward in the city of Boston or a certain ward in the city of Worcester all the children are of Irish parentage we will give two or three times as much money per head to the children of that ward as we do to a ward which contains Beacon street or the west end of Boston. We will have a common-school system for both, and the child of the merchant prince and the child of the Irish peasant shall sit side by side on the same benches, or if they are in different schools by reason of their different habitation shall have schools where precisely the same things are taught from the age of six to ten, and the Irish children and the German children and the French children are by no means behind in that equal race which is open to all.

Mr. President, it does not cost and it should not cost one cent more to give an ample common-school education to a child whose ancestors have been in ignorance for generations than to give the same education to a child whose ancestors have been scholars and in wealth for generations. It seems to me that is the answer.

Now, sir, I suppose that this amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa would require a change in the constitutions probably of a dozen Southern States. I do not know how many; I have not looked to see; but I suppose nearly all the constitutions recently established by those States within the last ten or fifteen years require that their expenditure for common schools shall be made without distinction of race or color. If that be true, this amendment, however well intended, is an amendment hostile to this bill, because it makes it impossible that it should be carried out.

Mr. President, there is but one thing—and it is just as well to speak out plain—which is the formidable obstacle in the secret heart I believe of my friends on this side of the Chamber, and of those persons who elsewhere in this country feel the difficulty in the adoption of this measure. There is not a Senator on this side of the Chamber who is not sure of the support of his constituents, notwithstanding the most liberal grant may be made from the Treasury if he can feel that the great object which we intend to be accomplished can be accomplished constitutionally and honestly and thoroughly. The feeling is the unwillingness to trust the public authorities of the State or of the nation with the administration of this fund.

It is the Zach Montgomery argument, the argument which fears that a great public policy intended to rescue this great Republic from ruin and degradation and illiteracy can not be fairly and honestly carried out by the representatives of the American people, because of the Zach Montgomeries, or whatever the name of the gentleman whose utterances have been read here this afternoon. Of course we have got to trust somebody in this world. We have trusted these Southern communities after the war by restoring them to all the privileges of equal citizenship; we have readmitted the States with their thirty-two Senators on this floor. Whatever warnings we may have had or whatever failures in some instances we may have had in having our confidences vindicated, yet on the whole I suppose nobody regrets the policy of which that was the result.

I believe that the risk, whatever it may be, which has been referred to by Senators here is not so great as the risk of the public consequence which will come from leaving these American citizens, soon to be voters, in this condition of ignorance. Why, Mr. President, the man sits in this Chamber within the sound of my voice to-day who will see the blacks at the South numbering 30,000,000 in this country. Does anybody believe that this Republic can endure if in those 30,000,000 there is a proportion of ignorance like that which the census reports read by the Senator from New Hampshire disclose to-day? I am willing to take a risk the extent of which is but the loss of $77,000,000 from the Treasury on the one side in pursuing the most feasible and practical attempt any man has yet suggested to rescue the Republic from that danger.

However it may be elsewhere, I am sure of the approbation of the great and venerable Commonwealth that I represent in voting for this bill unchanged, unemasculated, untampered with. I have learned my political opinions at the feet of a great statesman and great civil hero, whose form was familiar in the Senate Chamber for a period almost longer than that of a generation of men; and of all the lessons which I have learned from him and which I have learned from the great Commonwealth which was his teacher and inspirer, I have learned to believe in one which he uttered almost with his first public utterance from youthful lips, and which he repeated almost the last time he uttered his voice in life: Trust the Republic and the ideas which are its strength and safety.

I believe the people of the South, whatever else may be said of them, certainly are a people capable of being awakened by generous emotions. Is it credible that there can be any fear that States being American States, receiving this money from the bounty of their associates in the Union for this great public purpose, will fail as men of honor and men of character to apply it to the great purpose for which it is designed? For one I do not believe it.

Now, Mr. President, before I sit down, to show the true character of the bill, I ask to have some extracts from it read. I ask the Secretary to read, beginning at the seventeenth line of section 3, that sentence down to the word "provided."

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

No money shall be paid out under this act to any State or Territory that shall not have provided by law a system of free common schools for all of its children of school age, without distinction of race or color, either in the raising or distributing of school revenues or in the school facilities afforded.

Mr. HOAR. Now I should like to have the tenth section read down to and including the word "education."

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the moneys distributed under the provisions of this act shall be used only for common schools, not sectarian in character, in the school districts of the several States and Territories, in such way as to provide, as near as may be, for the equalization of school privileges to all the children of the school age prescribed by the law of the State or Territory wherein the expenditure shall be made, thereby giving to each child, without distinction of race or color, an equal opportunity for education.

Mr. HOAR. Now I should like to have the clause from line 17, in section 11, down to the word "provided," in line 30 read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And if any State or Territory shall misapply or allow to be misapplied, or in any manner appropriated or used other than for the purposes herein required, the funds, or any part thereof, received under the provisions of this act, or shall fail to comply with the conditions herein prescribed, or to report as herein provided, through its proper officers, the disposition thereof, and the other matters herein prescribed to be so reported, such State or Territory shall forfeit its right to any subsequent apportionment by virtue hereof until the full amount so misapplied, lost, or misappropriated shall have been replaced by such State or Territory and applied as herein required, and until such report shall have been made.

Mr. HOAR. Now read on to the word "provided" in the thirty-ninth line.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That if the public schools in any State admit pupils not within the ages herein specified, it shall not be deemed a failure to comply with the conditions herein. If it shall appear to the Secretary of the Interior that the funds received under this act for the preceding year by the State or Territory have been faithfully applied to the purposes contemplated by this act, and that the conditions thereof have been observed, then the Secretary of the Interior shall distribute the next year's appropriation as is hereinbefore provided.

Mr. HOAR. Now I ask to have the last section read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That no State or Territory that does not distribute the moneys raised for common-school purposes equally for the education of all the children, without distinction of race or color, shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this act.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa penetrates the hitherto imposing armor of this bill and discloses its fatal hollowness and weakness. It shows how the bill has departed from its original purpose, always heretofore maintained in the early stages of the discussion upon this most important subject, of legislation for the purpose of meeting illiteracy in the South wherever it was found in its most pronounced and dangerous aspect. All the record that has been given us so completely by the Senator from New Hampshire in charge of this bill, made up of reports presented now and heretofore by him, from great educational associations, of representations coming distinctively from Southern sources, from educationists and philanthropists everywhere, states that the object sought was the removal of the distinctive mass of illiteracy in the South in the colored race.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not like to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. HALE. I have but little time, and I ask the Senator not to interfere. I know the Senate is impatient.

Mr. BLAIR. I do not wish it understood that I assent to that statement as a fact.

Mr. HALE. To prove it I am going to read a few things from the mouth of the Senator and from the documents and papers that he has so faithfully placed before the Senate. In his report to the last Congress, found upon page 1240 of the RECORD of February 10—what the Senator from Iowa has well called a handy volume—I find this:

The committee unanimously approve the amount proposed to be appropriated in the bill and its distribution on the basis of illiteracy, and a majority recommend its passage in its present form.

Further along in the same report, on page 1246 of the same RECORD, I find this:

The only reasonable test is, for the present at least, that of illiteracy and not of population.

Still further, upon page 1249:

Whatever is done by the nation now should be directed where it will do the most good. Illiteracy is the disease, and the remedy must be given accordingly. Until the standard of knowledge is brought up to a reasonable level everywhere, implying capacity to discharge the duties of sovereignty and citizenship, the nation must, or at least should, in common prudence, distribute its money upon the basis of comparative ignorance.

In a very brief and pithy memorial presented to Congress in 1882, and adopted by the committee of which the Senator is the head, so far as being incorporated in its report is an adoption, by the committee of the National Educational Association, I find this, and I ask the attention of Senators to it:

Largely more than one-half of a fund for the education of the illiterate would go to the South for negro illiteracy; less than one-fourth because of white illiteracy. If Congress should create a fund which would give $3 per annum per capita for the education of this class alone, it will require an aggregate annual sum of $18,719,958. Of this, Mississippi, e. g., would receive $1,119,603; but of this $959,529 would be for colored illiterates and $160,344 for white illiterates.

Showing that in the stages when this subject was mooted and agitated, and when representatives from the South and from the great educational associations of the country were knocking at the doors of Congress and were asking this benefaction, everywhere it was understood that the basis of distribution would be illiteracy, that the money would be drawn for black and white illiteracy, and would go to cure black illiteracy in a proportion in some cases more than 3 to 1. On page 1254, Hon. Hugh Thompson, of South Carolina, has presented a very luminous paper treating of this whole subject, in which he says:

I believe I speak the sentiment of the majority of the people of the State when I say that we in South Carolina feel that the safety and prosperity of the State depend upon the education of that class of our citizens.

Having just referred before to the colored illiterates—

I need not speak to you, gentlemen of the committee, of the limited opportunities that the colored people have had heretofore for education, but you know that the absolute need for it now is such that if the United States Government does not hold out a helping hand to us at this time we shall continue to send forth each year illiterate voters by thousands.

Thus making his appeal for the colored illiterates, and there is no doubt, I think, in the mind of any Senator who has kept pace with the agitation for this bill, that the present bill does depart from the original purpose and the original claim. When that purpose was felt and known it undoubtedly awakened throughout the country, in the North where most of this money will come from, an answering response, a generous sentiment. There was no parleying, there was no disposition not to give this money from the Treasury, but everywhere, in New England, in the Middle States, in the great West, I believe there was the disposition to recognize this immense mass of illiteracy that had come to us as an inheritance from the war and from the freedom that had been given to the colored man; and that, as has been said in the report from which I have quoted, there was the disease and the medicine should be applied there; and that is why there has been so general accord throughout the North and the feeling here and evinced in the last Congress in favor of this appropriation.

But the bill in a most extreme way departs from any such purpose and leaves the colored man comparatively without the benefit that he should derive from this great benefaction. There were only two ways of the entire distribution of this money, either by population or by school ages, and it is curious that the tables which have been presented to us by the Senator from New Hampshire show that the percentage of illiteracy is just about the same as between the two races, whether you take the entire population or whether you take the school ages. So there were two methods, either to distribute to States and to localities by population or by school age, which is one method, or upon the basis of illiteracy.

What has the committee done? It has adopted both bases. It would not do to make the whole distribution upon the basis of population or school age in the entire country, for then the South would not receive the largest proportion, as everybody desires that it shall, and the object of the bill would be defeated. It would not do to carry the test of illiteracy into the distribution and expenditure of the money because that would give inevitably and unerringly the larger proportion to the colored race. And so the committee rejected that, and the bill is made up on this proposition, and that of itself ought to defeat it or ought to insure the passage of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, that illiteracy may be the basis to swell the fund, but not the basis upon which it shall be expended.

That is all there is in this bill. You swell the amount that shall go to the Southern States by adopting the basis of illiteracy; but when you have secured five-sixths of the amount of money included in its provisions, then although you approach nearer to the colossal evil that is sought to be remedied, the committee halts in its conclusion and declares that it will go to the rejected basis that it would not consider as applying to the States, and take either population or school age, one of which is about the same as the other. That is the objection that the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa proposes to remedy. It is entirely clear and distinct in its provisions. It is a perfectly plain course to follow; and this has been most singularly violated in the bill.

I can not so well show this as by quoting from the letter of Judge Albion W. Tourgee, whose interest on all questions which affect the colored man and whose knowledge of the situation in the Southern country are not surpassed by any man. Here are some of the facts and considerations presented by Judge Tourgee. He takes as the basis of his calculations the annual appropriations of $10,000,000, which is just about the average yearly amount given by this bill.

The most important fact connected with the measure, however, is the relation it bears to the education of the two races. It should be borne in mind that in all the Southern States the schools for the two races are distinct, and the funds for their support are now distributed according to the number of each race in the separate school districts, or else according to the number of children of each race within the school ages, as prescribed by the laws of the respective States. Practically there is no difference in these standards; to distribute according to the number of children is in effect to distribute according to the proportion of the two races. So that, if a State have 1,000,000 whites and 500,000 blacks, the white schools will have twice as much money as the colored schools.

The bill in question requires the fund thereby appropriated to be distributed in the same manner as the respective school funds, though it is assigned to the States on the basis of illiteracy. According to the report of the House committee of the last Congress the State would receive on account of each illiterate about $1.50 on the basis of an appropriation of $10,000,000. This sum, distributed as proposed, would give to the white schools of each State more than one-half of the whole sum, though only about one-fourth of the illiterates are of that race. In other words, instead of the national fund going to the education of the respective races in the ratio of their illiteracy each white illiterate will draw from this fund two or three times as much as the colored illiterate in the same State. The following table will show the practical operation of this measure:

Black and white illiteracy, census of 1880, ten years old and upward.

States.	White.		Black.
	Illiterates.	Per cent.	Illiterates.	Per cent.
Virginia	114,602	18.2	315,600	73.7
North Carolina	192,032	31.5	271,943	77.4
South Carolina	59,777	21.9	310,071	78.5
Georgia	128,934	22.9	391,492	81.6
Florida	19,763	19.9	60,420	70.7
Alabama	111,767	24.7	321,660	80.6
Mississippi	53,448	16.3	319,753	75.2
Louisiana	58,951	18.4	239,429	79.1
Total	739,364	22.2	2,250,438	78.1

It will be seen that there were almost three times as many colored as white illiterates, and, considering the character of the appropriation and the fact that all the school-houses and educational equipment of the ante-war systems in those States are held by and for the use of the white race, it would seem as if good policy and common sense would demand that the remedy should be spread somewhat evenly upon the sore—that the colored schools should be benefited somewhat in proportion to the amount to be received by the State on account of colored illiteracy. The following tables will show what would actually occur under the provisions of this bill. See foregoing table for the number of white and colored illiterates in each State, and for the amounts that would be received by several States on account of white and colored illiterates respectively on a basis of $10,000,000, or $1.60 for each illiterate:

States.	Received on account of white illiterates.	Paid on account of colored illiterates.
Virginia	$184,424	$505,172
North Carolina	308,316	435,184
South Carolina	98,817	493,883
Georgia	205,688	612,312
Florida	32,000	96,000
Alabama	179,252	515,348
Mississippi	85,199	512,801
Louisiana	94,623	415,377
Total	1,182,406	3,600,692

In other words, these eight Southern States would receive from the national Treasury on account of 739,364 white illiterates $1,182,406, and on account of 2,250,438 colored illiterates would receive annually $3,600,692 of the public funds of the nation. How would this be divided between the races? Who would be the real beneficiaries of the fund under the provisions of this bill? If distributed as the bill requires, supposing not a dollar to be lost or wasted, the white and colored schools would receive it in the proportions shown in the following table:

Amounts that white and colored schools would receive respectively under the Blair bill in several States.

States.	Population.		Schools would receive—
	White.	Colored.	White.	Colored.
Virginia	880,858	631,707	$401,877	$287,728
North Carolina	867,242	532,505	460,718	282,782
South Carolina	391,105	604,472	233,916	358,784
Georgia	816,906	725,274	442,528	391,472
Florida	142,605	126,888	71,763	56,237
Alabama	662,185	600,320	364,363	330,237
Mississippi	479,398	652,199	253,265	344,735
Louisiana	454,954	484,992	247,125	202,875
Total	4,695,253	4,335,357	2,475,555	2,314,850

In other words, these States receiving $1,182,406 from the national Treasury on account of 739,364 white illiterates, and $3,600,692 on account of 2,250,438 colored illiterates, will apply $2,475,555 of this fund to white schools, and only $2,314,850 of it to colored schools. So that while each illiterate black and white alike will draw $1.60 from the national Treasury for the benefit of the State, each white illiterate will receive for his education in a white school several times the amount that will be applied to the education of the colored illiterate in the schools of his race.

The following table shows the comparison between the amounts applied for the benefit of each:

Comparative value of white and colored illiteracy under the Blair bill.

States.	Amount received from General Government for each illiterate.	Amount applied to white schools for each white illiterate.	Amount applied to schools for each colored illiterate.
Virginia	$1 60	$3 54	$0 90
North Carolina	1 60	2 60	1 03
South Carolina	1 60	3 89	1 15
Georgia	1 60	3 43	99
Florida	1 60	3 63	93
Alabama	1 60	3 26	1 02
Mississippi	1 60	4 73	1 07
Louisiana	1 60	4 21	1 01

It is no wonder the most ardent Bourbons of the South are in favor of the Blair bill. It enables them to make the ignorant negro simply a cat's-paw with which to pull chestnuts out of the fire for the benefit of themselves.

Mr. HOAR. I want to ask the Senator, if he will permit me, one question.

Mr. HALE. The hour is so late, and I have only a few minutes, that I would rather proceed.

Mr. HOAR. Not an argument; I only wish to say a word, so that the Senator's narrative may be understood.

Mr. HALE. Go on.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not know that this basis of expenditure of the money has been one contained in every bill which has been introduced on the subject for the last fifteen years?

Mr. HALE. I have heard that many a time before. I am not in any way troubled by that. I am free to say that it happens not infrequently to me that in one Congress I investigate a thing more deeply than I did in a previous Congress. I am free to say that the danger, that the underlying demerit, that the wickedness, if I may call it so, of the adoption of this bill has never forced itself upon my mind as it has since the discussion in the present Congress.

Mr. HOAR. I will not interrupt the Senator again; but he will pardon me for saying that I did not interrupt him for the purpose of showing any inconsistency in him at all. That was not my point. He stated that the public had asked for these bills and had designed one thing and that now this bill proposed another thing. My proposition was that all the measures which have been before the public and have been discussed by all the persons to whom the Senator alluded in Congress all proposed the same basis of expenditure. That is all.

Mr. HALE. So far as the public desire goes to make this generous grant—for that is what it is—to meet an acknowledged and threatening evil in the South, I have stated that I do not believe that until this year, until the discussion evoked by the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, the people generally who have been interested in this bill have known the effect of its provisions or the departure of the committee from the test that was originally sought to be applied to this measure. I do not believe that that fact has been brought generally to the attention of the people until within comparatively the last few days.

Mr. President, I have listened attentively to every word that the Senator from New Hampshire has uttered, to the debate upon the other side of this Chamber, to the ingenious discussion of the Senator from Massachusetts, who is always able and ingenious, and I have thought sometimes the more so when he had the more difficulties to confront, and I have yet failed to hear anything that by me has been deemed a substantial answer to the provisions and the policy laid down in the short, simple, pithy amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa. A great deal of time has been consumed by ingenious discussion of the proposition that there is something fundamentally wrong in our legislating upon the basis of difference between the races.

Sir, that does not lead me to call a halt for one moment. If there is any one thing that is already settled by Southern policy, that has been ingrafted upon the laws of the States there and in many cases adopted as the organic and constitutional form of law, it is this assertion, bald and square and open, of the distinction between the two races. You may as well talk about our recognizing the flow of the waters of the Mississippi as to talk about our legislating now in reference to any distinction of races. It has become the established and almost natural condition in the South to-day, and is not to be easily broken down and destroyed and removed.

There is no Southern State that will receive the benefits of this benefaction that has not now a line which can not be removed running between white and colored schools; and no Senator who has opposed the provisions of the Allison amendment has, when interrogated, dared to express a hope that he or his children will live to see that line removed. We are confronted by that in legislating, and that the Senator from Iowa must have had clearly in his mind when he offered this amendment. Therefore it is not the amendment that raises the question of the color line. The Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from New York, in the debate the other day, deprecated any legislation of this kind, as did the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from New York declared that it would inaugurate a war of races if we recognized that distinction; and the Senator from Massachusetts, who has just taken his seat, has made an earnest and ingenious appeal here against our legislating in a form that will carry more benefaction from this bill to the colored than to the white scholar.

Does the Senator remember that if this amendment is not adopted each State will receive its fund upon the basis of illiteracy made up largely, as first read by me in the letter of Mr. Thompson, of black illiteracy, and that when that fund is swollen so that Mississippi will receive over $600,000, instead of its going for the benefit of the colored scholar in the schools, the illiterate, it will go in the proportion of 3 to 1 to the white, unless the general provisions which he dwells upon so much in this bill are sufficient to prevent that? I do not believe that those general provisions found in the sections which have been quoted will do that; but I prefer, as he does not, that even if his picture is correct, and the discrepancy is in favor of the colored scholar, the discrepancy should be upon that side rather than upon the side of the white scholar of the South. But there is no such practical difficulty. If this amendment is adopted, it is not going to give in any one State nine months colored schools and three months white schools.

That is only a figment of the imagination brought forward by the Senators who are struggling with the inevitable, pitiless logic of this amendment. There is going to be no such result as that.

All through this debate everywhere there has cropped out allusion to the vast mass of black illiteracy that has not yet been touched by the living fire of education. It lies in all the States, an immense mass blacker than Cimmerian darkness, that is threatening us to-day, and no school that has yet been maintained and no system that the Southern States have been enabled to pursue and to keep up has touched or transmitted fire to that great mass. But if you send this appropriation largely for the benefit of the illiteracy that exists there, then, instead of its unduly increasing the term of the colored schools, it will radiate and penetrate farther and farther year by year, so that where there are one thousand colored children attending school to-day there will be two thousand another year, and three thousand another, and five thousand another, and at last this whole mass will be transfused with the light that we are seeking to send there to the colored race; and that will be the practical benefit of it, and there will be no antagonism between the length of schools of the white and the colored scholars. That darkness and illiteracy is so vast, it looms up so colossally that no man need have any fear that in his life or his service in Congress the benefaction that is given here will any more than encompass it. That is the operation practically of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, and it is so clear, so plain that it removes every difficulty which has been set up here either by the Senator from New Hampshire in struggling with this amendment, or by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Now what are you going to do with this amendment, Mr. President? What is to be its fate? It can be beaten. The Senator from New Hampshire, the Senator from New York, and the Senator from Massachusetts, and other Senators on this side, with a solid vote upon the other side, may defeat this amendment. That is not an infrequent thing. The uneducated, the illiterate, the poor, the despised, the down-trodden, and not yet erect colored man will suffer; but that is no new thing; such a combination as that has many a time before interfered with his progress and his rights. Thirty-six years ago in the Senate of the United States the rights of the colored man were violated and outraged by a combination of the entire vote of one section of the country and a few recreant Senators upon the other side, and the law was enacted by such a combination that made slavery the rule and freedom the exception for the colored man. Seized in a State in the North, fleeing from bondage, nay, with his feet almost pressed upon the Canadian border, with the cup of liberty at his lips, he was remanded ruthlessly by the law so passed by such a combination to chains and slavery; and he may be here now kept out of what is his due for years by the defeat of this amendment.

Since then the colored man has had an eventful career. His life has been beset with vicissitudes and struggles and persecutions and death. When the war broke out he entered the Union Army. He laid down his body at Fort Wagner and Port Hudson and on scores of other battle-fields. His sympathies were always with the Union and with the flag. On dark nights he piloted the fugitives that were fleeing from Salisbury and Libby and Andersonville to the North; and when the war was over he emerged a grim and pathetic picture that took at once possession of the mind and imagination of every American politician and statesman.

The question was what should be done with him; what should be his status and condition. And, Mr. President, at that time no bill like the one that is now before the Senate was suited to his condition any more than this bill is to-day suited to his darkened state. And so the great amendments to the Constitution were adopted, establishing forever his liberty, clothing him with civil rights, and putting into his hand the ballot. Then there fell upon him a tempest so fearful that if it did not annihilate his race, might well have broken its spirit. The ku-klux riders harried him from Virginia to Texas. The Mississippi plan drove him away from the polls or slaughtered him there. The midnight riders of Louisiana hung him to the rafters of his burning cabin. The first citizens of Kemper County shot him down on election day and murdered his best friend in the presence of that friend's wife and children. New Orleans, Copiah, and Coushatta, and a hundred other ghastly places tell a story at which the world might weep; and the Senator from Massachusetts has never been backward in presenting these wrongs of the colored man to the Senate of the United States or to the House of Representatives or to the country at large; and it is only here now to my surprise that he is found wanting.

All this time the colored man has kept on patiently doing his silent, unobserved, and sometimes unappreciated work. He has plied the plow and the hoe; he has raised cotton and sugar; he has contributed to the resources of the South; he has acquired land. But, above all, he has found that the one thing he needs that shall make liberty and freedom available for him, to say nothing of making him a useful part of the body-politic, is the education that is given to white children in the North and in the South, which he has not got, and which the amendment of the Senator from Iowa seeks, so that it shall pass beyond doubt that he shall have not only in the sections where black schools are to-day established, but in that far-reaching, wide region where they are not to be found.

The amendment may be beaten; I do not know but that it is; but if it is beaten it ought to ring the death-knell of the bill that is presented by the Senator from New Hampshire. To me my way, after that, is plain as a path of shining light. I will not hesitate one moment, Mr. President and Senators, if this amendment of the Senator from Iowa is defeated, in voting against the bill. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The proposed amendment is to add to section 2 the following words:

> And in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children, the money paid in such State shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools in the proportion that the illiteracy of the white and colored persons aforesaid bear to each other, as shown by said census.

Mr. HALE. I am ready to stand or fall with that amendment. I am ready to take it before any Northern people, nay, before any Southern people. I will take it into the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts that has been so illustriously represented here, and never more so than to-day, right in the Senator's home among his neighbors and with the intelligent men and women and children that live upon New England hillsides and are found in her valleys and come out and make up her audiences in public meetings—I will stand or fall with that amendment, as I will here, Mr. President.

Mr. DOLPH. I submit an amendment to the amendment, and ask the Senator from Iowa if it does not make clearer what is intended?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa submits an amendment to the amendment, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 2 of the proposed amendment, after the word "money," it is proposed to strike out "paid in such State" and insert in lieu thereof "received by said State under the provisions of this bill;" so as to read:

> And in each State in which there shall be separate schools for white and colored children the money received by said State under the provisions of this bill shall be apportioned and paid out for the support of such white and colored schools, &c.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to move an amendment to the amendment. Is it now in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not now in order. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. HOAR. I give notice that I shall move at the proper time these words to be added to the amendment:

> Until there shall be an entirely equal provision in such State for its children of school age, without distinction of race or color.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator will find by looking at the last section of the bill that it covers all that ground:

> SEC. 15. That no State or Territory that does not distribute the moneys raised for common-school purposes equally for the education of all the children, without distinction of race or color, shall be entitled to any of the benefits of this act.

Mr. HOAR. I think the last section of the bill does cover that ground, but I want to have it covered in the amendment also.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me to offer an amendment?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to present two amendments, numbered 1 and 2, that they may be printed. I propose to offer them to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be received and printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendments offered by the Senator from Illinois be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment is—

> That for ten years next after the passage of this act there shall be annually appropriated, from the money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the following sums, to wit: The first year, the sum of $15,000,000; the second year, the sum of $17,500,000; the third year, the sum of $20,000,000; the fourth year, the sum of $18,000,000; the fifth year, the sum of $16,000,000; the sixth year, the sum of $14,000,000; the seventh year, the sum of $12,000,000; the eighth year, the sum of $10,000,000; the ninth year, the sum of $8,000,000; the tenth year, the sum of $6,000,000, ten annual appropriations in all, when appropriations under this act shall cease.

The next proposed amendment is:

> SEC. —. That there shall be appropriated and set apart the sum of $2,000,000, which shall be alloted to the several States and Territories on the same basis as the moneys appropriated in the first section, which shall be known as the common-school fund, to be paid out annually to each State and Territory at the end of the year, on proof of the expenditure made during each year, which shall be expended for the erection and construction of school-houses for the use and occupation of the pupils attending the common schools in the sparsely populated districts thereof where the local communities shall be comparatively unable to bear the burdens of taxation. Such school-houses shall be built in accordance with modern plans, which plans shall be furnished free on application to the Bureau of Education, Washington: Provided, however, That not more than $100 shall be paid from said fund toward the cost of any single school-house, nor more than one-half the cost thereof in any case; and the States and Territories shall annually make full report of all expenditures from the school-house fund to the Secretary of the Interior, as in case of other moneys received under the provisions of this act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. DOLPH] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, the scheme of this bill in the particular which is now attacked by the Senatar from Maine is the scheme of every proposition which has been made for national aid to education at the South. The men who drew this bill and those who have drawn the many bills which have preceded it, and the men who voted for it, thought if they distributed the money to the States in proportion to their need, and then required an expenditure in the States equally between black and white, child by child, that was just, the only just method, the only practicable method, and the only method which could be adopted without injury to the colored child.

I have not heard any reply anywhere to that proposition. It has been the opinion of everybody who has desired this thing to be done by the nation, the colored people of the South, their intelligent educators, of educational associations and bodies of philanthropists who are paying out their money million by million from private resources for the same object, associations like the American Missionary Association—all these persons as well as the persons in both Houses of Congress who have devoted their public lives to this scheme have agreed that it would be destruction to the colored man to send down to the South a fund which is to establish a distinction between races in the school advantages they are to receive.

Maintaining that position, it has occurred to the Senator from Maine as a just and reasonable and proper thing to do, to undertake to taunt me with failing in attachment to the cause of the colored people of this country, and to make a comparison with the persons who in olden times joined in passing the fugitive slave bill. Why, Mr. President, the Senator from Maine admits himself that he did not think of this particular objection before with the force that he has within the last three or four days; but the substance of what he said and his views and vote have been recorded against every scheme to help the colored people to an education by national aid, from the beginning. His is one of the two votes recorded against 33 votes when this bill as it now stands passed the Senate 33 to 11. It is one of the votes, unless I am mistaken, against the Burnside bill and against the bill reported by the honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. The Senator will not deny that he has been honestly on constitutional grounds, as they seem to him, on grounds of public policy, the avowed and persistent enemy of every scheme of national aid to education, from the beginning; and now he turns round and undertakes when this amendment is offered which seems to us to introduce a method which is to destroy the benefit of the bill to the colored population themselves, to range himself as the special friend of the colored man and put us who have been devoted to this cause for fifteen or twenty years in the attitude of being opposed to the interests of the class for whose benefit our labors have been directed.

I do not wish to rise here to make an exchange of taunts with my honorable friend from Maine. I have no doubt he pursues sincerely and honestly, as we all know he does ably, the measures which he thinks best for the public good. I have too much respect for him, I have very great respect for him and some little, I hope, for myself, and both would prevent me from undertaking to reply to the passages of his speech to which I have referred.

Mr. President, I have faults and follies, weaknesses and eccentricities and failures enough, and my worst enemy is not as sensible of them as I am myself; but I can afford to laugh at any taunt anywhere within the limits of the American Republic, which is based upon the suggestion that I am unfaithful in purpose or in conduct to the interest of my colored fellow-citizens of the South.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, no man who has served with the Senator from Massachusetts either in this body or elsewhere can have, with any candor or sincerity, impugned the earnestness and frankness with which he maintains his propositions. It was the farthest thing in my mind, in any comparisons that I was instituting, to insinuate that he was not as earnestly and sincerely of the belief that the proposition which he maintains is a good and sound one as that the proposition which I maintain is good and sound with me. But I did think and do think that he is mistaken, and that he is now pursuing a path which, if carried out to its legitimate end, he will see as well as I shall see, if we both live, is not such as he would desire.

Mr. HOAR. I understood my honorable friend to compare my attitude with that of the men who supported the fugitive-slave bill.

Mr. HALE. The Senator could hardly have supposed that. I was instancing that as a parallel in history as to occurrences and events that have touched upon the career of the colored race; but I certainly had no intention of comparing the political or moral attitude of the Senator from Massachusetts now upon this matter with the men who at that time voted for the act to which I referred. I do not in any way place them upon a level, but all the same I claim, believing in this amendment and not believing in the bill, that the result would be disastrous to the colored race as it was at that time. So with the greatest respect for the Senator from Massachusetts, recognizing his high ability and the earnestness and persistence with which he pursues his course, and giving him all credit for believing in this bill, as I believe in the amendment, I leave it there.

As to my own record upon kindred questions, that is a matter of very little account. I did not vote for this bill in the last Congress because I had my fears and doubts at that time. Those fears and those doubts have been increased, have been sharpened, and are greater and stronger every hour that I reflect upon this bill as reported by the committee, and for these reasons I am against it, and I am in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have had no purpose to discuss the bill under consideration. If I had had such purpose I should have availed myself of an earlier opportunity in the course of this debate. I have tried to give a great deal of serious thought to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa. The Senator from Maine and others here have spoken of it as a new suggestion, a dawning of a new light upon this question, something that had not been thrown before Congress at the last session, something original with the Senator from Iowa. I suppose he does not assert that claim.

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him. I rose a moment ago to ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question and to remind him that the principle which he now condemns has been contained in every educational proposition that I ever read of coming from educational associations.

Mr. HOAR. I beg the Senator's pardon. I meant to answer his question before I sat down, but not at the particular moment that he sought to interpose when I was on something else. I wish to say that if that be true, then the difference between the Senator from Iowa and me is that I do not think his amendment has the meaning and effect which he thinks it has. That is the trouble.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not like to disturb the Senator from Indiana, and so I will wait until he gets through.

Mr. HARRISON. Go on, sir.

Mr. PLATT. If the Senator from Indiana will permit me, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Oh, no; we must finish the bill to-night.

Mr. PLATT. I have had some experience in the Senate, not so much as others have had; but I find that when we undertake at this hour——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. HARRISON. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. PLATT. I find when we undertake to force a vote at 6 o'clock the result is that about half the Senate will be away in half an hour paired; and a great many gentlemen are away paired now. I think there might be some arrangement about taking this vote to-morrow, and I wish the Senator from New Hampshire would try to have some arrangement as to an hour at which the vote may be taken to-morrow.

Mr. BLAIR. What hour would the Senator suggest? I have given notice several times of a desire to sit the question out; I did this morning.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say about arrangements that I do not intend for one to consent to any arrangement that shall deprive me of having a few minutes to state my reasons in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa and my reasons for being obliged to vote against this bill if the amendment is not adopted. Any arrangement that will give me and everybody else who wishes to speak a fair chance, I shall be glad of, and I should prefer to go on to-night and finish it if it takes till morning.

Mr. BLAIR. The Senator knows very well that nobody desires to prevent his speaking on this bill or on any amendment to it. He has urged me more than any other man in the Senate to insist all the time upon action, action; all the while against adjournment; for perpetual sessions, and I do not propose to give way to-night unless the Senate by a call of the yeas and nays adjourns.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will stand by you on that.

Mr. PLATT. Then I will make the motion.

Mr. BLAIR. Nor in doing this do I wish to assert a disposition to in any way trespass on the general desire of the Senate; but the Senator from Vermont, as we all know, is not sparing in his suggestions that are in the direction of the use of the whip of the Senate on those who may have charge of measures, so that they shall work in the Senate night and day until they are disposed of and other matters can be brought to the attention of the body. I am prepared to stay here. If the Senate see fit to adjourn, it is their matter, and not mine.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BLAIR. Certainly.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to say that inasmuch as I have introduced three if not four bills on the subject of general education, and inasmuch as nothing contained in any of these bills seems to be appreciated by anybody but myself, I propose to make a few suggestions in regard to this bill to-morrow. Therefore if the Senator will give way for that purpose I will move an adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No motion to adjourn has been received by the Chair. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. HARRISON] has the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator to give way for a motion to adjourn.

Mr. HARRISON. I give way for that motion.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask the Senator from Illinois to give way for a moment. I wish to offer an amendment to the bill that it may be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposed amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. HARRISON. I understand the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] expects to be absent to-morrow and desires to say a word or two in response to some of the suggestions of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. If the Senator from Illinois will withdraw his motion I will yield the floor to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. LOGAN. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. I only wish now to say that I endeavored to interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts to call his attention to the fact that the principle of this amendment, although it may not have been embodied in form in the bills which have been generally presented and especially the bill that we voted upon at the last Congress, yet has been universally regarded by the educators of this country as an essential feature of any bill that could be proposed; and I do not in any sense claim the paternity of this suggestion. It is embodied in all the papers that the Senator from New Hampshire has presented. It is running through everything in the way of literature on this subject. The national board of education that assembled at Louisville, and that prepared an elaborate bill upon this subject, incorporated this very provision in their bill more than three years ago, and have pressed it upon both Houses of Congress from time to time as an essential feature of any bill that should be adopted by Congress for the purpose of securing education to the illiterate people of the South. And, therefore, in presenting this proposition I merely do it in pursuance of suggestions that have been made over and over again upon this subject.

I have before me a report made at the last Congress by a Republican minority of the Committee on Education of the House of Representatives upon what is known as the Willis bill, indorsing and embodying the principle of this amendment as essential to any bill that should take money out of the public Treasury of the United States. All the statistics show, as the Senator from Vermont suggests to me, that it is absolutely essential in order that this money may be applied where the difficulty exists. I have not time and I do not wish to detain the Senate for the purpose of reading from the report of the Commissioner of Education on this subject.

I only desire now to say that so far from my amendment being presented in hostility to this bill it is presented for the purpose of improving it in order that it may be acceptable in this day and this hour before its effect is known to the people of the Northern States, and that it shall endure for the eight years for which it is proposed with the approval of the people of this country whose money we propose to appropriate from year to year for the purpose of sustaining these schools.

Let me ask the Senators from the Southern States who are the chief beneficiaries of this bill, if they believe that all the people of this country will willingly assent that $40,000,000 of this $77,000,000 shall go to the sixteen Southern States for the education of the white people and only $18,000,000 for the education of the colored people in these States, when the white people in the South do not show a very great degree of illiteracy beyond that of their brethren in the Northern States. Do you suppose that this bill with this provision in it unchanged as it stands now will endure the criticism of the just people of the Northern States in favor of such an inequitable and unjust application of this money?

It is to promote the bill that I have offered this amendment, and when the Senator from Massachusetts said we might as well speak plainly on the subject, I think I may as well speak plainly upon it as I do not expect to be here when this vote is taken. I have a belief, whether justly or unjustly founded, that this vicious proposition of distribution of money within the States has been made for the purpose of securing votes for this bill in certain sections and localities, without which the votes could not be secured. I am led to that from the statements made to-day by the Senator from Florida [Mr. CALL] in part and the remarks made upon that side of the Chamber by other Senators. They of course are willing that this benefaction shall come from the general Treasury received by taxation from all the people of this country, when in its distribution, local and otherwise, $40,000,000 out of the $58,000,000 that go to one section of this country shall go to build up and support the common-school systems of the white people of the South and supplement the money that they raise for that purpose. More than two-thirds of this money goes for that purpose; and yet every suggestion for this bill comes from the fact that the colored race there is illiterate.

What I want is exact justice, and I venture here and now the prophecy that the people of this country will not consent to the unjust application of this money that is proposed in States where they have distinctions. Seek to remove the idea as we may, there are in every one of these sixteen States separate schools for whites and blacks, required by law, as the Senator from Vermont justly says, and these separate schools are as much recognized as a part of the political policies of those States as any other thing in existence; and even here in the District of Columbia, under our own exclusive control and legislation, everybody who knows anything about the school system of the District knows that there is a line of demarkation in the common schools of the District of Columbia, supported by taxation and by appropriations from the Federal Treasury. And yet because I propose to recognize that distinction and say only in terms that where the separate schools exist there shall be an application of the money in order to benefit those schools in proportion, I am taunted with the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from New Hampshire that I propose to establish a race distinction. I take things as this bill gives them, and I propose to appropriate the money which goes into the Federal Treasury by taxation on the very basis of the bill and upon the basis of the statement that has been made by every man from the trustees of the Peabody fund and from every collective association of educated men that this money should be applied to the sore where it exists, to the illiteracy of the colored man and the white man, if it be in proportion to that illiteracy; and, therefore, Mr. President, I repeat that this amendment is not to be whistled down the wind by any suggestion that I am endeavoring by it to establish a race distinction or to establish any distinction that does not exist now.

Mr. BLAIR. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Vermont calls my attention to a fact which I did not know, but which is a fact that needs correction, if it be so, and that is that here in this District, where the colored and the white children are placed upon nearly an absolute equality as to numbers in the appropriation of the public funds, only one-third of the money goes to the colored schools, while two-thirds of it goes to the white schools.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That appears from the documents.

Mr. ALLISON. Right upon that subject I have here a report from the State of Georgia which I may use as an illustration—a State in which there are colored youths of school age 240,285; white youths of school age, 267,902, or very nearly an equality between those of school age of the white and colored races. I find on looking down to see how the public schools are administered in the State of Georgia that there are public schools for white pupils, 4,517; public schools for colored pupils, 2,020. There are, with an almost absolute equality of colored and white youths in the State of Georgia, twice as many white schools as there are colored schools; and yet I find that the laws of the State of Georgia are upon a par with the suggested provisions of this bill. The laws of every State in the South provide for an exact equality. To-day there is not a law on their statute-books, there is not a constitution so far as I know but what provides that as between these races there shall be absolute equality of school privileges and other privileges, including civil rights.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I want to get at the meaning of the amendment. Does not the Senator understand that the effect of the amendment would be this, in connection with the other provisions of the bill, that the State is put under obligation to make an equal distribution of all the fund it raises, and if the per capita basis is the basis that prevails in the State, then we put the State under bonds to give each colored child just as much per capita as we do the white child?

Now, that being so, if the amendment offered by the Senator is adopted, does it not inevitably result in giving to the colored children a large excess per capita of an educational fund over what the white children have, and do we not restrain the State from equalizing that distribution?

Mr. ALLISON. I see the bent of mind of the Senator from Indiana. But suppose it has the full effect that he suggests for illustration, is not that as necessary to this colored race as any possible thing can be? This is a bounty, with all due deference to the Senator from Massachusetts, by the General Government. It matters not that that bounty is gathered into the Treasury by taxation. It is a bounty, so far as we are concerned, to the State.

The Senator from New Hampshire a while ago, in the most natural way possible, when my friend from Kansas criticised the interpretation which will be placed on this bill by the Secretary of the Interior, said there was no particular interpretation about it, there was nothing for the Secretary of the Interior to do under this bill. I agree with him there is nothing particular for us to do here or for the Secretary of the Interior or any officer of the United States except to pay the money over to these States. We do not follow that money in any sense. Now, if it is a bounty, it is a bounty that we can give with such restrictions and conditions as we choose to place upon it; and if we believe, as I believe, that these restrictions and limitations are necessary in order to equalize the colored race or any other race for education with the white race, then this bill ought to pass with my amendment, even if it goes to the extent suggested by the Senator from Indiana in its interpretation. I am willing to go that far to remove the illiteracy among the colored race equal to 80 per cent. of its entire population, when the illiteracy of the white race in the same locality is only equal to 18 per cent. of population.

Now, Mr. President, I beg pardon of the Senate for occupying even this brief time in the discussion of this amendment; and I would not have done so but for the fact that I shall be compelled to be absent to-morrow. I renew the motion that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CALL. If the Senator will allow me I should like to ask a question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Before the Chair submits the motion to adjourn, the Chair wishes to announce that several messages have been received from the President of the United States, one of which has probably already been published. The Chair will not present them now, but have them read to-morrow morning, if that is the pleasure of the Senate.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for the adoption of an order withdrawing certain papers, that they may go to the Committee on Claims at its meeting to-morrow morning:

Ordered, That the papers in the case of William Ervin be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims, there being no adverse report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not sure that there has not been an adverse report, if that is the same William Ervin I have heard of before.

Mr. INGALLS. There has been no adverse report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The order will be made subject to the rule. The Senator from Iowa moves that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock and 3 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 2, 1886.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Rev. S. K. COX, of Washington, D. C.

The Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings.

Mr. WEAVER, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of so much of the Journal as relates to the introduction and reference of bills and joint resolutions.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The remainder of the Journal was read and approved.

POSTAL BALANCES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Postmaster-General, relative to a resolution of the House calling for a report of all balances to and from the United States, as shown by the books of the Register and Sixth Auditor of the Treasury; which was referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MONEYS SEIZED BY GENERALS BUTLER AND BANKS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House, a statement of moneys and funds seized by Generals B. F. Butler and N. P. Banks at New Orleans during the late civil war, and of the disposition thereof as shown by the records of the Treasury Department; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC STORE, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a letter from the appraiser of the port of New York, relative to the necessity of increased accommodations for the United States public store at that port; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING FOR TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, asking an increase in the appropriations for printing for the use of the Treasury Department for the current fiscal year; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF CERTAIN EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair lays before the House, for the purpose of making an order for their printing, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to additional appropriations for a light at the entrance of Gray's Harbor, Washington Territory; also a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury with reference to salaries in the office of the Register, and a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting an estimate from the Secretary of the Interior of an appropriation for the completion and decoration of the Pension Office, which have heretofore been referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and an order will now be made for their printing.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

The SPEAKER, under the rule, laid before the House the bill (S. 54) to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to the Indians on the various reservations and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPRINT OF TARIFF BILL.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Printing to submit a privileged report from that committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following resolution—

"Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House 30,000 extra copies of the bill entitled 'A bill to reduce tariff taxes,' introduced into the House February 15, 1886, by Hon. WILLIAM MORRISON, and that said copies shall be distributed pro rata among the Members and Delegates by the superintendent of the House document-room, who shall keep a strict account thereof—report that they have considered the same, and recommend its adoption with the following amendment:

Strike out the word "thirty" in said resolution wherever it occurs and insert the word "two" in lieu thereof.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The estimated cost of printing 2,000 copies is $50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. BARKSDALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call the standing and select committees for reports.

DISTRICT AND CIRCUIT COURTS, EAU CLAIRE, WIS.

Mr. CASWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (H. House bill 102 was ordered to be laid on the table.

ROBERT A. ANDERSON.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. 877) for the relief of Robert A. Anderson, of the State of Georgia; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. This completes the call of the standing and select committees.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BELMONT, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. 6392) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. HOLMAN. All points of order are reserved upon this bill.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. That is, as to whether or not, under the present rules of the House, it is necessary to reserve points of order to enable a member on the floor of the House to raise questions of order under the rule upon certain items of these appropriation bills?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is a question that ought not to be decided in advance; and besides that, the Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that it is a question to be properly presented to the chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union when the bill is under consideration in the committee and not for the Speaker to determine.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. It is a question that comes up every time one of these bills comes in, and there ought to be an authoritative decision.

The SPEAKER. This is a question about which there has been much controversy, as the gentleman from Ohio knows, on the floor of the House.

Mr. BELMONT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from the consideration of the following items contained in the estimates:

PAYMENT OF AWARDS BY FRENCH AND AMERICAN CLAIMS COMMISSION.

Payment of the amount necessary to strike a balance with France, after the payment, under the final award made by the late French and American Claims Commission against the United States, of the claims of French citizens against the Government, under the treaty of January 15, 1880, between this country and France, $15,639.16.

INTERNATIONAL BOUNDARY SURVEY, UNITED STATES AND MEXICO.

To enable the President to continue the execution of the engagement of the convention of July 29, 1882, between the United States of America and the United States of Mexico, providing for an international boundary survey to relocate the existing frontier line between the two countries west of the Rio Grande, $100,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

HAYTIAN ARBITRATION COMMISSION.

For one-half the expense of joint commission which sat at Washington to arbitrate the claims of Antonio Pelletier and A. H. Lazare against the Government of Hayti, $1,577.44; and for one-half the compensation of the arbitrator, $2,500; in all, $4,077.44, the same being the proportion due from the Government of the United States.

Under the estimates of the Department these were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, but upon consideration it has been thought best, since it has been usual to report them in the sundry civil bill, to refer them back for reference to the Appropriations Committee, and I ask that that reference be made.

The SPEAKER. Is this a part of the report of the Secretary?

Mr. BELMONT. It came before the committee with the estimates of the Department.

The SPEAKER. From the Secretary of State?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes, sir. The committee asks that it be discharged from the further consideration of these subjects, and that they be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. As I have said, they have heretofore been reported in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. BEACH. I wish to inquire whether the purpose the gentleman from New York [Mr. BELMONT] has in view can not be accomplished under the rule by a simple reference of these papers from his committee to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. This is not a memorial or a petition, which can be referred in that way under the rule; but it is an official paper, referred by the vote of the House to the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the distribution of the President's message and accompanying documents.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the estimates indicated, and they were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

STANDARD SILVER DOLLARS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the House of Representatives calling for information concerning the circulation of standard silver dollars and the policy to be pursued as to the payment of silver; which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

Mr. BLAND. I ask that the communication be printed.

The SPEAKER. It will be printed.

Mr. LANHAM. I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that this communication be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. MORRISON. I object.

The SPEAKER. It will be printed as a document under the rules.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Unless there is a disposition on the part of the House to proceed with the consideration of reports of committees under the hour rule, I would be glad to move now that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to resume consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. BLAND. The Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures has not succeeded in getting a time fixed for the consideration of the bill reported by that committee; therefore I must insist on the committees being called every morning till that committee is reached and can be heard on the most important subject now before the country.

Mr. DUNHAM. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois make a motion?

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I have no desire to antagonize the wish of the House.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour for the consideration of reports of committees begins at two minutes after 1 o'clock.

TESTS OF IRON, STEEL, ETC.

The Committee on Manufactures was called.

Mr. WISE. I am instructed by the Committee on Manufactures to call up for consideration the bill H. R. 5555.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5555) authorizing the President to appoint a commission of experts, skilled in the investigation, production, and use of metallic substances and other structural materials, to execute tests and experiments on iron, steel, and other materials used in the construction of bridges, buildings, and mechanical structures, and deduce useful rules therefrom.

The SPEAKER. This bill is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. WISE. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HAMMOND in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 5555, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., that the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a commission of seven members, selected from among men skilled in the investigation, production, and use of metallic substances and other structural materials, to hold their appointment during the pleasure of the President of the United States, which commission shall plan and superintend the execution of such tests and investigations of materials used extensively in the construction of buildings, bridges, ships, and other structures, and machinery, as the Secretary of the Interior shall authorize and direct. The said commission shall organize itself, and adopt such rules and make such assignment of duties among its members as it shall deem most promotive of the object of its appointment. Vacancies occurring from time to time in said commission shall be filled by the President of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the said commission is hereby authorized to appoint a principal expert, who shall personally conduct the examinations and tests which the commission shall direct, with such assistants and laborers as may be necessary, at such rate of compensation as may be recommended by the commission and approved in advance by the Secretary of the Interior. It may also purchase such material for test and investigation as may from time to time be required: Provided, however, That no purchases shall be made and no liability incurred under this act until Congress shall have previously made appropriation therefor.

SEC. 3. That manufacturers of iron, steel, and other structural materials who may request tests of their productions shall file with the commission a full and detailed statement of the mode and process of manufacture of such production, also giving the name and character of each of the original ingredients and the proportion which the component parts entering into such production bear to each other.

SEC. 4. That the said commission shall make, on or before the 1st of December in each year, a report to the Secretary of the Interior, containing a full and detailed statement of its work, of the results of the tests and investigations made by it, and also of such scientific principles and practical rules deduced therefrom as it shall consider most useful, which report shall be transmitted by the Secretary to Congress.

SEC. 5. That the members of said commission shall be entitled to mileage and other necessary expenses incurred in the prosecution of their duties, but no salaries as members of the commission; and its accounts shall be returned to and approved by the Secretary of the Interior before any payment is made.

SEC. 6. That this act shall take effect from its passage; and for the purpose of executing the provisions of the same the sum of $25,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, is hereby appropriated.

Mr. WISE. I yield the time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL], who is the author of this bill, and who reported it to the House.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania. This bill provides for the appointment of a commission of seven members, skilled in the investigation, production, and uses of metallic substances and other structural material, who shall hold their appointment during the pleasure of the President. The purpose of the commission is to execute tests and experiments on iron, steel, and other material used in the construction of buildings, bridges, ships, and other mechanical structures. The result of such tests and investigations, and also such scientific principles and practicable rules as may be deduced therefrom, are to be reported annually to the Secretary of the Interior, and by the Secretary transmitted to Congress.

The commission are authorized to appoint a principal expert, who shall personally conduct the examinations and tests which the commission may direct; this expert to receive such compensation as may be agreed upon by the commission and approved by the Secretary of the Interior. The commissioners themselves are not to receive any compensation.

The necessity for such a commission lies in the now recognized and admitted fact that the theories and tables heretofore relied upon, particularly when applied to large sections of iron and steel, are unreliable and misleading, and doubtless have been the cause of many great disasters, resulting in the loss of life and destruction of property, and for which our scientific experts have not been able to satisfactorily account, such as the Ashtabula bridge disaster, the destruction of the great bridge over the Tyne, in England, and other disasters too numerous other structures, buildings, and vessels, too numerous too mention.

The Government has now at the Watertown arsenal the best and most powerful testing-machine in the world. It has the capacity for testing up to 800,000 pounds, yet its mechanism is so perfect that it accurately registers the strength of a single hair. It is the purpose of this bill to utilize this machine and give to the public in a reliable form the benefits of the tests to be made upon it.

By the aid of this machine has already been demonstrated a fact long suspected: that we were being misled by false theories as to the strength of structural materials of large sections; and our scientific men will today admit that without the aid of a testing-machine such as this they could not judge correctly the strength or carrying capacity of one of these heavy beams over our heads in this Hall or the tensile strength of the large bolts which sustain them from above.

The Committee on Manufactures had before them petitions from more than fifteen hundred civil, mining, and mechanical engineers, living in twenty-eight different States, all asking for the adoption of this measure; also, petitions from insurance and other companies, representing $300,000,000 of capital, as well as from builders all over the country. Every person who travels upon one of our steamers or who crosses over a bridge upon a railroad car should be as deeply interested in this question as any of the petitioners, as their safety depends upon the knowlege which the operation of this bill will give to designers and builders.

I now yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT].

Mr. HEWITT. I will occupy only a moment or two in making a statement in reference to the character of this bill, which will modify to some extent the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL]. That gentleman is under the impression that the great testing-machine at the Watertown arsenal can be made available for experiments by this commission. That was the fact two years ago, but in the course of the investigation made by the Ordnance Commission of the House, of which I have the honor to be a member, we ascertained that that machine, which the gentleman justly says is one of the wonders of the world, is fully occupied in making tests on the Government work. The demand for its use for private sources is so large that the commission came to the conclusion—I think I may state this is a little in advance of any report they may make—came to the conclusion that more testing-machines ought to be built, in order to get at the facts which are necessary to be known, in order that modern structures may be safe and useful. All constructions at this time use steel as the material of principal concern.

Now, there has been in the last ten years a perfect revolution in the manufacture of steel. We have entered upon a new world literally; and all that we knew about steel made only in crucibles is of no use when we come to use open-hearth steel, or Bessemer steel, or basic steel, or steel compressed under the hammer or by liquid compression with the hydraulic press.

The action is totally different from anything we have ever known before, and the result has been a most remarkable reduction in the price of steel. Steel has now fallen to about 2 cents a pound for large masses, whereas formerly similar masses could not have been produced at a dollar a pound. As a matter of course, the extension of the use of steel has been beyond parallel in the past, but we are moving in the dark, and very much in the dark. Human life, to say nothing of economy of construction, is at stake in this matter. Every locomotive, every car, every bridge, every building has to do with these new problems. Now, I am opposed, as a rule, to all governmental interference with private industries. I am not disposed to set up a governmental test-shop; but unless the Government does intervene these results can not be ascertained. All that we know to-day we know by the use of this testing-machine at the Watertown arsenal, which, as I have said, is overworked. The scientific men of the country (as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL], has well said), fifteen hundred in number, have been interesting themselves in the matter for the last three years, and they see no other way out of this difficulty than by the establishment of a commission with power to take the work energetically in hand and get the information which is required by the mechanics and engineers of the country in order to produce safe, economical, useful results. I have no doubt that in the construction of the steamers, upon which the Committee on Naval Affairs hope to report favorably to this House, hundreds of thousands of dollars could be saved if this knowledge were now in hand. It is not in hand, and my urgency about this bill comes merely from the facts which I state to the House and from my knowledge that the work will be productive of results to the country worth a thousand-fold any expense it may involve.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEWITT. Certainly.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Was there not a commission some few years since which traversed very much the same ground proposed to be covered by this commission?

Mr. HEWITT. There was; a commission which had the use of the machine at the Watertown arsenal, and to-day the engineering work of this country proceeds upon the incomplete results achieved by that commission. They made a report, which was printed in two large volumes, and which is now in such request that it can not be supplied and undoubtedly ought to be reprinted. I know of nothing more valuable and nothing more incomplete than the results which that commission arrived at. In other words, they got to the fringe of the subject but they really never got beyond that.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will my colleague yield to me for a question?

Mr. HEWITT. Certainly.

Mr. HISCOCK. I wish to ask my colleague whether, if this investigation is to be carried on, it would not be far better to have it conducted by either the War Department or the Navy Department?

Mr. HEWITT. I will answer my colleague by saying that I shall be very glad to see it carried on by any Department. If either of the Departments named would make the investigation I think that would be a very good plan; but the commission proposed is to be a mixed commission. I do not know whether this bill provides for that or not, but the bill which I originally saw did provide for a mixed commission.

Mr. HISCOCK. This does not.

Mr. HEWITT. Well, I think there ought to be a mixed commission. I think it ought to be composed of an engineer officer of the Army, an engineer officer of the Navy, and civilians. I quite agree with my colleague; but I do not want this work to stop in the mean time.

Mr. HISCOCK. As my colleague is well aware, this investigation has been prosecuted to a great extent already, and my idea is that it should be continued by those who have been for some time pushing it on.

Mr. HEWITT. They have not been pushing it in the direction which is necessary for the uses of civil life. The machine at the Watertown arsenal, as my colleague well knows, is now fully occupied in making tests for Government use, chiefly in relation to ordnance.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEWITT. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I desire to ask the gentleman what obligation the Government is under to build another testing-machine to make tests of materials for private parties?

Mr. HEWITT. No the slightest.

Mr. MCMILLIN. And, furthermore, whether there is not a claim now pending before this Congress, which was pending also in the last Congress, for $200,000, because the Government has given the use of that machine to private parties.

Mr. HISCOCK. And a claim which ought to be paid, undoubtedly.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I quite agree with the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] in this, that we ought not to go further in impairing this man's rights.

Mr. REED, of Maine. This does not impair his rights.

Mr. MCMILLIN. This does not impair his rights! The gentleman from Maine [Mr. REED] differs in opinion, very materially in opinion, from the claimant himself.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] yield?

Mr. HEWITT. I yielded for a question from my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] with great pleasure. I answer him that there is no obligation imposed upon the Government by this bill to build another testing-machine.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I understood the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] that it had become necessary to build another testing-machine, and I understood him to advocate doing it.

Mr. HEWITT. I said that one of the conclusions arrived at by the commission (I suppose I may venture to state this unofficially) was, that that present machine at the Watertown arsenal was inadequate to do the amount of work pressed upon it. Undoubtedly the work of this proposed commission would involve the building of new machines at somebody's cost; but there is no provision in this bill that the machine shall be built at the cost of the Government, and I am under the impression that it would not be necessary to build it at Government cost. I think that if this commission had the right to go forward and make the tests the machine would be supplied by other parties, who would simply charge, as the Government does now, a royalty for the use of the machine. As to the other question about the claim of the inventor, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] is entirely right. There is such a claim pending. I have personally investigated it. I think it is as honest and meritorious a claim as I have ever known; and of all the triumphs of American inventive genius, not excepting the cotton-gin, I look upon this testing-machine as the greatest and highest, and I have never been willing to allow a private individual to build for the Government for $50,000 a machine that cost over $200,000 without recouping him for his actual outlay, especially when the Government finds that machine as essential to the carrying on of its business as it does its Army and its Navy.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I wish to ask the gentleman from New York whether the benefits to be derived from the tests proposed in this bill would not more largely accrue to corporations engaged in building heavy structures, as, for instance, railroad bridges and other structures involving large masses of material?

Mr. HEWITT. Beyond all doubt.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. And whether these benefits would be of any great practical advantage in the use of steel in the ordinary avenues of life or industry?

Mr. HEWITT. I answer my friend from Kansas in both particulars in the affirmative; and while it will be of enormous use to railroad companies which carry him and me, and which are only the servants of the public——

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Except when they are the masters.

Mr. HEWITT. Well, when they are the masters I bow down and worship as does my friend from Kansas. We can not help ourselves. But whether they be masters or servants, I want to go across bridges safely; and that is the interest the public has in this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL] has notified the Chair that he declines to yield further time to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FARQUHAR].

Mr. FARQUHAR. Mr. Speaker, in common with the friends and advocates of this bill in and out of Congress, I have only one fear as to its fate, namely, the indifference which in either House too often characterizes consideration of public measures not coming within the arena of current politics. Were it possible to relatively bring the proposed measure in line with the silver question, the regulation of interstate commerce, tariff legislation, or even the excitable Pan-Electric investigation, it would possibly receive such degree of attention and favor as its friends know it deserves in a Congress of public-spirited legislators.

The original commission, the results of whose work have been called in question during the debate this morning, was created in March, 1875, and expired by limitation in June, 1879. Fault having been found with the work done by that commission, it is fair to say, in justice to the able men who were named as its members, that they lost years of investigation because this testing-machine had not been built and placed at work. There were long conferences as to chemical analyses, as to means and methods of tests, which it is well known to all had been discussed for years in the scientific associations of this country, but had not reached any real results. That is the definite, basal proposition to start with; and it is important by way of apology in judging the work of this commission as shown by its reports.

But it is also fair to say that this commission must have reached some results of general interest when three of the best scientific associations of America have by resolutions and through the speeches of their leaders declared the work of that commission, though imperfect in consequence of the little time it was in existence, of immeasurable benefit both to the Government and to the industrial interests of the land.

During the four years of its existence the board had built, on an entirely new principle, the testing-machine which is now at the Watertown arsenal, concerning which a very competent authority says that when a few additions to it have been made it will be the most remarkable machine of this kind that has ever been constructed; and already the result of the work on it has been to revolutionize most of our ideas upon the methods of testing metals. Speaking of this machine, Professor Egleston, of Columbia College, as high an authority in physics as this country can produce, says:

While this machine is the most accurate one that has ever been built, it is very expensive to use it, costing nearly $25 a day; but after the work is done, it is not only extremely accurate, but all the work done on it at any time can be compared with any other work done at any previous period; a condition of things which up to this time has never existed. If the work of the commission had produced no other result than to prove that reliable and comparable data could only be obtained on full-sized pieces, and that other testing-machines constructed to work on specimens of reduced area which have been used up to the present time not only do not give comparable results, but that many of them, from faulty construction, are in themselves entirely unreliable, the board would have done all that could have been reasonably asked of it. If this machine, however, or any number of machines like it, is kept constantly in use by private parties, the public will not necessarily be any the wiser for the work done, for the reason that although the expense of such investigations is much greater when done by private individuals than by a commission, these results will not usually be published, nor will the criticism of engineers generally be invited or obtained.

I desire to quote the same excellent authority on a phase of the matter which more practically concerns the public welfare. He says:

The factors of safety used by engineers are taken from tables constructed many years ago by foreign engineers, on materials made under entirely different processes from those now in use and on metals manufactured abroad. We know hardly anything of these factors as applied to material of American manufacture. We are using tables and formulæ which we are finding to our cost are only approximately reliable.

Members of the House will readily call to mind the great Ashtabula disaster, which happened some years ago on the Lake Shore Railroad. It was my province in the course of my own business to pass upon every line of the evidence adduced on that trial, and out of seven or eight experts, scientific men and practical railroad men, who gave testimony in that great case, it is safe to say—and the fact has been alluded to in the debates of scientific bodies—that no two of those men, experts as they were, could agree as to the cause of the disaster, and no two could agree as to the practical "factors of safety" in any construction of that kind. So that great and appalling disaster is as yet entirely enshrouded in mystery. Only a few years ago we had a similar one in Scotland—the great Tay bridge disaster—the cause of which is still a question among scientific bodies in Great Britain.

Now let us learn what practical men, men who are building our railroad bridges every day, say as to their knowledge of the very structural materials they have handled. Mr. Chanute, who is quoted in the report made by this committee, and who is one of the best-known bridge builders in this country, says:

There is great uncertainty as to the actual strength of the bridges which we are daily erecting. Their strength is of course limited by that of the weakest part, but while we endeavor to make every part equally strong, as well as we know how, yet we are almost entirely ignorant as to what is actually the weakest part of a bridge of any magnitude, and of just where it would give way first if loaded to rupture.

The main question involved in the passage of this bill is, shall the Government, having at its command all this expensive machinery at the Watertown arsenal, do all this experimenting in driblets, or shall this Congress authorize the President to appoint this commission of experts to make investigation as to these productions, and so formulate and publish the experiments as to give the industrial world as well as the general public a knowledge as to the true factors entering into construction and chemical analyses?

There have been many complaints made in respect to dilatoriness of the experiments made at Watertown arsenal. I grant that many of our great manufacturers have had good cause to make them. But, "first come, first served," was the rule.

Now, were it possible that the Government might act for itself, I would regard it as still more advantageous if what the Government does in its own experiments shall be superintended by the best scientific knowledge this country can produce in members of these scientific bodies, who shall studiously and persistently systematize all the knowledge gained from these tests and give the results to the public, and not merely allow a few Government officers to reap the benefit of the information obtained by these great machines.

Mr. McMILLIN. Will the gentleman from New York permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. FARQUHAR. With pleasure.

Mr. McMILLIN. Is it not a fact, the result of these tests are now published, and all parties can get the benefit of them if they wish to do so?

Mr. FARQUHAR. They are published the same as many other things are published, by the scientific schools.

Mr. McMILLIN. Yes.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I grant any private individual can go there and get the tests by himself and for himself.

Mr. McMILLIN. What is the use, then, of paying $20,000 for information which can be obtained in that way?

Mr. FARQUHAR. I would like to give the reason why, if it would not infringe on certain men's pride. I will give, however, a general reason. I have much more faith and confidence in a commission constituted of scientific and mechanical engineers of the country than in any commission made up merely of Government officers.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Let me suggest to the gentleman from New York one other thing, and that is, this investigation is to be systematic, and not dependent on the particular wants of persons seeking for particular things. That is another advantage in addition to what the gentleman himself has named.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. I would like to know of the gentleman from New York whether it is proposed to build a new machine or to remove the Watertown machine and have it supervised?

Mr. FARQUHAR. To use the Watertown machine. Let me answer further that it is the intention of the commission, if appointed, to redetermine many of the formulæ which came from the first report of that old commission. Many of the large manufactories of this country furnished material under the strictest chemical analyses, and were willing to give the chemical analysis of every one of the materials furnished, and not keep the information alone for their own selfish benefit, but give it to the whole country, to every manufacturer, whether he ran a five-thousand plant or a five-million one.

I want to call the attention of the House to another feature outside of the advantage sought to be gained by the passage of this bill, and I hope it is one which appeals to every thinking member of this House. I wish to say that public safety, public economy, and the needs of true knowledge demand the passage of the bill.

Now, the main question involved in the passage of this bill is: Shall the Government, with expensive and reliable machinery in its possession, selfishly do its own testing in driblets and let men of science and manufacturers of structural materials formulate results from detached details; or shall this Congress authorize the President to appoint a commission of experts, skilled in the investigation, production, and use of metallic substances and other structural materials, to execute scientific tests, as the title of this bill recites, and deduce useful rules therefrom? And another question presents itself. Is it not the duty of the Government, careful of the education of its army and naval officers, to place in the hands of the professors and cadets at the national academies text-books correct in theory and fact? How better can this beneficent reform be brought about than by the passage of this measure?

Public safety, public economy, and the need of true knowledge demand it. Hundreds of young men are being graduated annually from our technological schools. When the enthusiasm of the graduate has passed away and they assume the active duties of life as engineers or any other cognate department of science; when duty is measured by responsibility and responsibility by duty; when they come in associated intercourse in national assemblies with such leaders in physics as Egleston, Thurston, Lanza, and scores of others, pre-eminent in scientific attainments—the very men who are petitioning this Congress for the opportunity of scientifically equipping these and like young men for useful places in a grand profession—when these young men, I say, with such mentorial surroundings, enter the active duties of their profession and know that their success lies in doubtful experimental paths with few positive experiential guides, their ambition is dwarfed, and in the professional race of life they are disadvantageously handicapped. This should not be so. Their text-books and standards for official work should be as near perfection as the results of modern scientific investigation can make them. Pass this bill, and thus help on the good work of scientific knowledge.

Having somewhat settled the question as to the need of such a commission as is proposed in the bill, some of the rigid economists on this floor will likely note by its sixth section that an appropriation of $25,000 is needed to execute its provisions, and more than likely will ask themselves the question, Will the thing pay? Experts say that it will. Professor Egleston, one of them, puts it in this way:

If, as the results of the works of such a commission, we could increase the profitable use or cut down the weight of constructive materials 3 per cent., the United States would gain every year over $100,000 in each of its navy-yards.

I hold in my hand a letter on this subject from probably the largest bridge-building company in this country—the Union Bridge Company of Buffalo, N. Y., the company which constructed and completed in thirty-three weeks the famous double-track cantalever railway bridge spanning the Niagara at Whirlpool Rapids, and which has just been awarded the contract for constructing a double-track railway bridge, about a mile in length, in New South Wales, to be completed in two years and a half at an estimated cost of nearly $2,000,000, and for the construction of which the Buffalo company successfully competed with the best-known English, Scotch, French, German, Flemish, Australian, and American engineers. The value which a great company like this places upon testing-machines for determining the proper strength of their own structural iron and steel may be surmised from the fact that they are building for themselves now, at a very large expense, a testing-machine of 600 tons for their own use.

Surely the statement of such a fact should divest their opinion on the merits of the bill under consideration of self-interest.

In this letter they say:

The very tests which should be made to determine the proper strength of structural iron and steel are more elaborate and expensive than any private corporation or company could be expected to carry out, and are of such wide and universal public benefit that they should be executed by the Government.

I know, Mr. Chairman, that the expression has passed beyond provincial bounds that Buffalo, not satisfied with furnishing the country with more than her quota of Presidents of the United States, wants the whole world. I grant that in great engineering enterprises her field is the world—in bridge-building.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in concluding my brief remarks on this important measure I have one remaining desire, and that is to arouse the pride and honor of the members of this House to make a record of enlightened and beneficent legislation by the passage of this bill. Make it possible that the records of the scientific associations of this country and Europe shall preserve for long years to come the fact that the Forty-ninth Congress of the United States appreciated one public interest at least higher than party politics and gave its aid and indorsement to a measure like this.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. MCCOOK, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to joint resolutions of the House of the following titles, namely:

Joint resolution (H. Res. 105) to print 12,500 copies of the eulogies on Ruben Ellwood, late a Representative in Congress; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 124) to print 31,000 copies of the eulogies on Thomas A. Hendricks, late Vice-President of the United States.

It also announced that the Senate disagreed to the amendment of the House to the bill of the Senate No. 610, to provide a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, internal-revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail in the city of Fort Smith, Ark., and had requested a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes thereon, and had appointed Mr. MAHONE, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. BERRY as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution, a joint resolution, and a bill of the following titles; in which concurrence was requested, namely:

Concurrent resolution providing for the printing of statements relative to the payments of awards under the treaties with France and Spain;

Joint resolution (S. 39) to authorize the printing of the proceedings in Congress in accepting the statue of the late James A. Garfield, President of the United States; and

A bill (S. 1653) to forward a copy of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to each of our legations abroad.

TESTS OF STRUCTURAL MATERIALS.

The Committee of the Whole resumed its session.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANDERSON].

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I know nothing of this bill whatever except in so far as I have sought information during the course of this discussion. It seems to me to amount, however, to this: The first fact is, that there was some years since a commission appointed for the exact purpose proposed by this bill; that the Government had built this testing-machine and had it in operation; that under the supervision of that commission certain valuable tests were made and reported, and that that report is considered to be full and valuable. It also appears that it is now sought to recreate that commission, and to appropriate twenty-five thousand more dollars for the purpose of maintaining the commission, which shall continue the tests. It is alleged that this is unnecessary, first for the benefit of the industries of the country, and second for the benefit of science, and I speak of science first.

In my opinion we have spent altogether too much money on such scientific propositions, as arctic explorations and subjects of that character, which are just precisely such things as this, because turning to the industries of this country and the practical benefit which it is sought by this proposed commission to confer it will be found that it is a benefit that will accrue to large corporations solely, or which will accrue to those who are building large structures, and who must necessarily provide steel and iron and other structural materials in large masses. But, Mr. Chairman, you take an ordinary mechanic of the country, using steel and iron for ordinary purposes, in a house for instance, or in a blacksmith-shop; there is no necessity that he shall test their tensile strength. Probably he knows what it is in advance from experience, and hence he has no need for such tests as are contemplated by this bill, which will benefit only those who use great masses of metal as, say, in large bridges or in the machinery or structures of corporations.

Now, I assert that so far as they are concerned they are able to make their own experiments. If, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] said, it be true that these tests would save in the erection of a bridge or building of a vessel hundreds of thousands of dollars, then that fact of itself is an inducement to the owner or contractor himself to make these tests or have them made at the Watertown arsenal for the purpose of effecting this saving. That might not be true in the case of a contractor for a Government vessel, because then he must follow specifications, but it would be true in the case of an owner or contractor for any other work than Government work; and I can not see why the Government should expend this additional $25,000 for the benefit of a class of men, few in number, who are abundantly able to make that expenditure for themselves, especially as the profit must accrue to them. I would very much rather vote to give to the widow of the dead soldier $12 a month than to give to this commission $25,000 for the purpose of making these tests.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman now yield to me for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas, Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Do you not think the Government itself should understand the tensile power of iron and steel in order to make contracts?

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kansas. Yes, sir; and the last commission gave it that information.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania. I yield now to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCKINLEY].

Mr. MCKINLEY. I have no desire to consume the time of the committee, and should like to have a vote, if possible, this morning. With that view I yield back the time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMPBELL].

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the committee rise to report the bill back to the House.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I hope that will not be done. I desire to be heard on this question.

Mr. REED, of Maine. Can the bill be read at this time?

Mr. MCMILLIN. I have no objection to the bill being again read, but not in my time.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I rise to a question of order. Has not the hour for the consideration of the bill expired?

The CHAIRMAN. It has not. Five minutes of the hour still remain.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Mr. Chairman, a number of years ago the Government, having a difficulty in testing the metals of which its various structures were made, resolved to try to get a testing-machine that would facilitate and make certain that work. A certain appropriation was made, if I remember correctly it was $25,000, for the construction of such a machine. A machinist of the State of New York undertook the work, and at Watertown constructed the machine that has been mentioned in this debate. The Government paid him not only the $25,000 originally contracted for, but, as I now remember, about $30,000 more.

Soon after the construction of that machine, in the Forty-sixth Congress, as will be remembered by those here who were members of that Congress, a proposition was brought before this body to throw open that machine to private individuals for the purpose of testing bridge and other structural material.

The machine is a marvelous one. It has been properly said—I do not know whether the remark has been made to-day, but it has been made in Congress heretofore—that this machine will test the strength of a single hair or of a beam that takes 800,000 pounds to part it. The proposition to throw that machine open to the use of the public passed, and as a consequence the man who built the machine claimed that the Government had injured him by giving the public general use of it, and came before the last Congress, and I presume is before this Congress, asking $200,000.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Will the gentleman permit me——

Mr. MCMILLIN. In one moment I will yield to the gentleman. Now, the parties using that machine under the act of 1871 did not have to pay any part of the construction of the machine, but simply the expense of using it, and if I can read through the cracks sufficiently this proposition is to get rid of paying anything for its use; that is the plain English of this proceeding; and the question here is whether this House will require parties to pay the pittances heretofore paid to get their work well done, or will it appoint a commission to sit at the discretion of the President four years, eight years, twelve years, or twenty years, as the Presidents of the United States may desire, and draw $25,000 per annum for their salary. That is the question.

Mr. CAMPBELL, of Pennsylvania. I insist on my motion that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN] has the floor.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I yield now to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. SEYMOUR] for a question.

Mr. SEYMOUR. Does not the gentleman remember that the greater portion of the claim made here in the last Congress by the inventor was not for his invention, but for material and money actually expended by him and for the time he had expended on this at the Government's request; and that it was admitted by everybody that there was at least $60,000 due him for time and labor, to say nothing of the value of the invention?

Mr. MCMILLIN. On the contrary, there was not an admission on the part of everybody that there was $60,000 due him. He claimed there was an additional amount due on the original construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The morning hour has expired, and the committee will rise.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HAMMOND reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5555) authorizing the President to appoint a commission of experts, skilled in the investigation, production, and use of metallic substances and other structural materials, to execute tests and experiments on iron, steel, and other materials used in the construction of bridges, buildings, and mechanical structures, and deduce useful rules therefrom, had come to no resolution thereon.

PENSIONS APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering general appropriation bills. The bill first in order is the unfinished business, the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has the floor.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I left?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. CANNON. I propose to use a portion of that time. This bill, as has been stated, carries $75,000,000 for pensions. The annual amount of the pension-roll now, saying nothing about the payment of arrears, is about $39,000,000. It is gradually increasing from year to year, and properly so, and no doubt will increase in the future.

A MEMBER. Not long.

Mr. CANNON. There are many propositions made from time to time in the House and the Senate for a change in the law touching pensions. One with which gentlemen are quite familiar is to repeal the limitation in the arrears act—to my mind a very proper thing to do—placing all soldiers upon an exact equality in this respect. The cost, as near as can be estimated, would be from $150,000,000 to $222,000,000.

The latter is the maximum estimate, and my own impression is that one hundred and fifty millions would be more nearly right. A bill passed the House a few days ago increasing the pensions of widows and dependent parents to $12 a month, which will involve a cost of from six to seven million dollars per annum if the bill should become a law, as I think it should. Again, I am informed that there are various bills pending before the appropriate committees, some of which should be enacted. There are bills pending, as I understand, to place upon the pension-roll all soldiers of the late war who were honorably discharged. That is a measure which has a great many advocates throughout the country and many upon this floor. I want to speak of it a moment now in connection with another proposition to which I wish to call attention. Two million eight hundred and fifty thousand enlistments is the best estimate we can get, and doubtless it is very nearly correct, as the total number of enlistments during the late war.

Probably 550,000 of those were double enlistments, giving 2,300,000 as the number of original enlistments. If you deduct from that 800,000, which, as near as I can ascertain after careful inquiry, is about the number of those soldiers who were killed or who died leaving no surviving widows or minor children, it leaves a million and a half as the number who will receive a service pension in the event of the passage of the bill referred to. The average pension of those now upon the roll is about $110 per annum; but count the average at about $100 if the service pension should be given. That would make the cost of passing this bill, after deducting those now on the roll, $117,970,000 per annum. Add to that the $39,000,000, the amount of the annual roll now, and you have $156,000,000 expenditure per annum as the result of such legislation—legislation which, in my judgment, ought not to be enacted.

Yet there is a growing public opinion demanding it, and I have no doubt that the time will come when a bill will pass with perhaps some restrictions giving a service pension to the soldiers of the late war. But I fear that such legislation at this time would do much to break down the policy of the Government which has been pursued since its formation, namely, to rely upon a citizen soldiery for defense, because it would be seen at once that if the pension-roll were to be swollen to that extent it would beget a burden of taxation which would be felt as a grievance even by the very men receiving the pensions, and would postpone, if not render impossible, the repeal of the limitation of the arrears-of-pension act and various other provisions for soldiers who are actually disabled.

Yet, as I have said, I do believe that the public opinion demanding such legislation will continue to grow unless apt and proper legislation is had in another direction, and it is to this other legislation that I now wish to refer very briefly. There is scarcely a neighborhood in this country in which are not found one or more soldiers who are disabled on account of service in the late war, and who are not on the pension-roll owing to their inability to make the technical proof prescribed by the Pension Office, and many of these were the most meritorious soldiers in the service.

To illustrate: A soldier makes his application for pension; his Government, after due examination by its surgeons, mustered him into the service; the law required that he should be a sound man and fill the regulations; but he is now required to prove that he was not disabled at time of muster (his muster should be conclusive upon that point). Again, if there is no record of his disability or treatment in hospital, then he must make strong proof that the disability was incurred in the line of duty; the regimental surgeons, his officers and comrades, are frequently found to have died, in other cases are found to be living in distant parts of the country, and frequently not to be found at all, and when found are not able to recollect with sufficient accuracy the exact injury received and the circumstances under which it was incurred. Many soldiers have said to me that as a general rule a hospital record was the most undesirable thing a good soldier could have while in the service, but the most useful thing a disabled soldier could have when it comes to procuring a pension.

After very careful inquiry, as nearly as I can ascertain, there are one hundred thousand soldiers of the late war—not more than that number—who are disabled, who were honorably discharged, and who are dependent upon their labor in whole or in part for support, and who can not make the technical proof—often in my opinion too technical—to have their names written upon the pension-roll. Many of these are in the poor-house, many receive charitable aid, many are suffering for the want of the necessaries of life and too proud to ask of individuals or municipalities that aid which the Government they helped to save owes them, and which they can not receive on account of the strictness of proof required.

It is time for Congress to step in and cut the gordian knot; it is time as to this class of cases for Congress to set aside the regulations and precedents made by the Pension Office, and by law to place this class of soldiers upon the pension-roll without further proof. This act of tardy justice is not only proper for the soldier, but would prove a measure of economy to the Treasury; for the growing demand to now give every soldier a service pension receives its principal strength from the failure to pension these applicants that everybody knows should be pensioned.

Now a word as to the cost of the proposed legislation. The average annual value of each pension of the 345,000 now on the roll is $110.36. Placing the average annual pension to each of the 100,000 persons proposed would make the amount $10,000,000 a year as the cost of the proposed legislation.

I would couple, however, with such legislation, if I had the power to write legislation upon the statute-book, a provision which would pension the dependent parent who is now dependent. You all understand what the law is on that subject at the present time. Before the old father or mother who lost a son in the Army can obtain a pension not only must dependence be proved, but it must also be proved that the father or the mother was dependent at the time of the death of the son.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Has not that law been changed? I think it has.

Mr. CANNON. No, sir; it has not been. The Senate last Congress passed a bill changing it.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. No; the House.

Mr. CANNON. The Senate passed a bill last Congress changing the law in that respect, and also providing that soldiers who are disabled and can not make the technical proof required should be pensioned without further proof, but the bill failed in the House.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Let me ask the gentleman whether the Congress before the last did not pass the Warner bill, which made that change in the law? The bill passed the House, and I supposed it passed the Senate.

Mr. CANNON. No; the change in the law has not been made.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Such a bill passed the House.

Mr. CANNON. I have but little time, and I want to hasten on.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. The Warner bill did pass in the Congress before the last. It passed the House; I do not know whether it passed the Senate.

Mr. BROWN, of Pennsylvania. It did not become a law.

Mr. CANNON. The Senate bill, which contained both of these provisions, and which passed the Senate in the last Congress, did not pass the House. But it does not make much difference what passed the House or Senate last Congress or the Congress before or any other Congress. This Congress should not stand upon the merit or demerit of any former Congress. The question is, what is the law now and what changes should be made?

I was speaking of the question of pensioning dependent parents. In most instances, when the vigorous boy was just growing into manhood he enlisted. Up to that time he had been dependent upon his parents, rather than they dependent upon him. When he lost his life in the Army the staff upon which the parents depended for support in old age was taken away. Twenty years have passed, and old age and poverty have come upon many of them. They are not like other parents who did not lose sons in the war. Yet you ask these people, under legislation proper at the time of its passage, to prove they were dependent twenty years ago. Now, this legislation touching dependent parents would not be a very expensive matter. I have not estimated this expense, but I have inquired the expense of the other provision diligently.

Another thing: We have now, and properly, under the law as it is, a wonderfully expensive clerical force and a force of special agents in the Pension Bureau, a large clerical force in the Adjutant-General's Office and in the Surgeon-General's Office. Under existing law this force must remain for a long time. Have gentlemen looked to see what that force costs? In the Pension Office, saying nothing about the building, saying nothing about contingent expenses, stationery, and many other expenses, it costs $3,149,000 a year to keep a force of special agents and a clerical force to adjudicate these claims. More than that, as nearly as I can tell it costs about $2,000,000 in the Adjutant-General's Office, in the Surgeon-General's Office, and elsewhere in the Departments of the Government, making over $5,000,000 per annum. Now, I am not here to say that this force is too great under existing law; but I do say that the proposed legislation would only cost $10,000,000 a year, and that a large part of this force costing $5,000,000 a year could soon be dispensed with, and that it would be better to pay this money to worthy soldiers than to an army of office-holders, many of whom, it appears to me, spend much of their time in trying to keep applicants off the pension-roll rather than to expedite the allowance of their claims.

[Here the hammer fell.]

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The committee rose informally, when several messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the House by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. 3846) to remove the disabilities of Alexander P. Stewart, of La Fayette County, Mississippi;

An act (H. R. 3827) to remove the political disabilities of Thomas L. Rosser; and

An act (H. R. 4409) to remove the disabilities of Edward G. W. Butler, of Missouri.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union resumed its session.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, although a member of the committee which reported this bill, and also of the subcommittee originally charged with its preparation, I had no purpose, and, I may add, no wish, to participate in its discussion on the floor of this House. I had supposed, Mr. Chairman, that, following the salutary custom hitherto, a bill simply making appropriations for the payment of pensions due under existing law, and as to which all of us are agreed, would pass the Committee of the Whole and pass the House without any remarks that would necessarily call for reply. But my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], in the speech submitted by him on last Thursday, for reasons which I have no doubt were satisfactory to himself, but as it seems to me under stress of a political emergency, departed from this custom and treated the House to what is happily somewhat novel in recent debates, an old-time, regulation, political, and sectional speech.

It was scarcely necessary, Mr. Chairman, and yet it was exceedingly natural, that the gentleman should pause, from time to time, in the line of his remarks to assure this side of the House that he was animated only by the kindliest feeling. Those of us who know the frankness of the man and the gallantry of the soldier, could have no doubt on that point. We well understood that it was, after all, but stage thunder, or, if the gentleman will allow me to say it, stage roaring; and when the necessities of the occasion allow him to doff the political mask we shall see that he, like Snug the joiner, is "a very gentle beast and of a good conscience." [Laughter and applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, he presented to us on last Thursday the melancholy spectacle of a politician in search of a political issue. Are there no present issues which call for the thoughtful attention of the patriot and the statesman? Are there no great economic issues which loom portentous on the political horizon of this country that my friend should turn deliberately from the present and from the future and introduce into this body the dead and discredited issues of the past?

In attempting to follow him, as a member of the same committee, I shall, perhaps, occasionally have to do that which I never expected to do on this floor, engage in remarks somewhat partisan. Of that partisanship which consists in full and stout belief in the principles of one's party, and which desires to see those principles applied in the administration of public affairs, I am as guilty as any member on this floor; but of that partisanship which cankers the personal feelings, and finds expression either in personal or sectional prejudice, I hope I am as free as any member on this floor. But if I am not mistaken, Mr. Chairman, there is no longer any successful conjuring with the issues raised by the gentleman from Iowa. If I do not mistake the recent action of the American people, if I do not mistake the general temper of the people; the sectional issue wherever raised and by whomsoever raised, will never lead man or party to another political victory in this country. [Applause.]

The gentleman began his remarks by stating that the amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill was more than $1,000,000 less than the average appropriation for the past six years. That, Mr. Chairman, even if correct, and it is not, is not a matter of any consequence whatever. The amount proposed to be appropriated is the exact sum estimated by the Department for the needs of the coming fiscal year. Whether it be more or whether it be less than the appropriation for the last fiscal year is not, I say, a matter of any moment. No party that has ever held power in this House, whether the preponderance lay upon that side or upon this, has ever failed to make ample appropriations for the payment of pensions. And whether the Republicans held sway or the "confederate brigadiers" in this House, no pensioner on your pension-roll has had to wait one day beyond the allotted time for the receipt of his pension because of any failure here to provide the money. Neither party can claim precedence over the other, neither party can censure the other for dereliction in this respect. If there has ever been a deficiency in the amount appropriated, it has been only because the estimates from the Department itself have been erroneous.

No ground exists for boasting on the one side or the other, and I do not believe any ground ever will exist for such boasting, because I do not believe any House will ever sit here that will refuse to appropriate, promptly, every dollar to pay pensions as they accrue under existing law.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, there is a danger far greater than this. There is rather the danger that henceforward men, in both parties, will so insult the ex-soldiers of this country as to suppose that theirs is a vote which can be obtained for partisan purposes, by holding out to them unlimited largesses from the public Treasury. This, I repeat, is the danger of the future, rather than that there will be lack of funds to meet just demands under existing laws.

Sir, in the course of that debate the gentleman from New York [Mr. HISCOCK], trusting to his memory and not examining the record, plunged into the discussion and said that in the last session of the Forty-sixth Congress there was a deliberate cutting down of the appropriation to the amount of $16,000,000 in the pension bill, for the purpose of throwing upon the incoming Republican House the necessity of making an extravagant appropriation. In order that I may not misquote him I turn to the official record of this House and find his language there. He says:

> The matter was discussed; and it was said, "If we do not appropriate enough, a Republican Congress will be in session before there will be any necessity to expend the money, and they can appropriate it." Instead of the sum being charged to the Democratic party, it was charged to us. We were compelled to make the appropriation or there would have been no money in the Treasury to answer the drafts made on behalf of the pensioners. Sixteen millions of dollars! There could be no mistake of arithmetic in reference to so large a sum as that—nearly one-quarter of the whole bill. So far as that item is concerned, it is reported by the committee on this bill; yet a Democratic committee reported a bill—we could protest against it, of course—reported a bill embracing an aggregate appropriation which any arithmetical calculation would have demonstrated was insufficient for the needs of the service.

And, further, in answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL]:

> The subcommittee delegated to investigate the question came to the conclusion that it was insufficient; but the result was that these $16,000,000 were not appropriated.

Now, sir, I return to the RECORD of the last session of the Forty-sixth Congress, and find that the pension appropriation bill then reported was not debated in the House in any form of controversy, was not criticised in this House on the score of its insufficiency in any manner whatever. The gentleman from New York was a member of the committee on Appropriations. If this fact had been developed in committee why did not the gentleman come into the House and raise his voice against the passage of the bill? On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, that bill in the Forty-sixth Congress, although reported from a Democratic committee had, as the chairman of the subcommittee reporting it and carrying it through this House, that distinguished and unmistakable Republican leader, Mr. Jay Hubbell, of Michigan. He not only made no suggestion in the consideration of the bill, that it was insufficient for the demands of the public service, but expressly averred that it exactly followed the Book of Estimates.

> The total amount—
> So reads the report—
> recommended in the bill carries $50,000,000, exactly the amount recommended by the estimates.

And, mark you, those were the estimates sent down by a Republican Commissioner of Pensions through a Republican Secretary of the Interior.

In the course of his remarks Mr. Hubbell seemed called upon to explain why so large an appropriation was made, and he introduced into his speech some very salutary reflections on the necessity of guarding this beneficent system of pensions against the frauds supposed to be perpetrated under it.

So much for the remarks of the gentleman from New York.

Let me further say that in the method of dealing with the pension appropriations at the Department, there can, in the strict sense of the word, be no deficiency. They are not settled, strictly from year to year, as is the case with the other annual appropriations. They are treated as continuing appropriations against which orders or drafts are drawn; and when the amount becomes low Congress is called upon to supply additional funds; so if there had been any criticism upon the pension appropriation bill of the Forty-sixth Congress, reported and carried through the House by Mr. Jay Hubbell, I ask the gentleman from Iowa why was it that his party, subsequently thereto, selected him, as had been done previously, to conduct the Congressional campaign of 1882, and gave him as his most efficient adjutant my distinguished friend from Iowa? The reputation of my friend from Iowa on this side of the House is an honored one, and I wish to assure him of the united thanks both of my political associates and myself for the manner in which that campaign was conducted, because I feel that neither he nor Mr. Hubbell will ever have the thanks due to their exertions from the other side of the House. [Laughter.]

The gentleman criticised the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, because he called upon the Commissioner of Pensions to answer some questions as to the amount probably necessary to meet the payments under the existing laws, and under the proposed changes in the law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I suppose that any member of this House, to aid him in the performance of a public duty, has the right to call on any Department for the information it may be able to furnish. I suppose there is no man in this House who, with greater propriety than the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], by virtue of his position on this side, by virtue of his position as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, could call upon the Commissioner of Pensions for information desired with reference to legislation proposed in this body. But the gentleman is not satisfied; in fact he expresses vigorous dissatisfaction with the answer received from the Pension Office.

I am not here to defend any officer in any Department of this Government. Each man must make his own record; but I do insist that the remark of the gentleman from Iowa was not just to the Commissioner of Pensions. When the vacancy occurred in the Pension Office with the incoming administration, there was probably as much anxiety and as much interest in the country to know whom the President would select for that high and responsible position as for any other place in his power; and when the choice finally fell upon this distinguished soldier from Illinois, there was, I believe, general expression throughout the country that a wise and patriotic choice had been made, and that the office would be conducted under him in a spirit of fidelity to the people of the country and of fairness to all his fellow-soldiers.

I have no long-standing acquaintance with General Black. But I do know that with the first gun that signaled the opening of our civil strife he volunteered into your service as a private soldier. I know that through four and a half years of service, in which he did not lay down his arms until the last echo of a hostile gun had died out in the land, he had fought himself up from rank to rank until he commanded a brigade, bearing upon his person the disabling marks of his own faithful service. It was I say a wise and patriotic choice made by the President, and I do not believe anything has developed since then, certainly nothing has developed in these letters which my friend so criticises, to forfeit to the slightest extent the growing confidence of the people in that officer.

Sir, I turn to the report of the Pension Office for the past fiscal year, and I find this significant fact that since he has been in the charge of that office the delay which so often amounts to a denial of justice, especially in pension cases, has been greatly mitigated. I turn to the table in connection with this report and find that out of between 35,000 and 36,000 cases adjudicated and allowed in the last year, 16,000 of them belonged to the time between the 17th day of March when General Black became Commissioner and the 1st of July, and 19,000 to the nearly nine months of the rest of the year.

But the gentleman from Iowa, in vigorous language, says that in making reply to the letter of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations he has inserted into the stomach of that letter a ninety-three million dollar lie; and to prove that, he takes two items upon which he comments and to which I will now call the attention of the committee. When asked for an estimate of the amount which will have to be paid under the arrears-of-pensions act, if existing limitations are repealed, he answers $302,000,000. In answer to the question as to the amount that has been paid hitherto he gives the sum as $179,000,000. Now, I perfectly agree with my friend from Iowa, and upon that point I will be as frank as possible, that the $302,000,000, if we take the language in which its summing up is made, is a mistake. What General Black claims, and claims stoutly to this day, is that he understood those questions asked by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations in a different manner from what they are understood by the gentleman from Iowa and myself. In order to ascertain whether there is a mistake or not——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Since the gentleman from West Virginia has the ear of General Black, will he inform me whether he also claims that he misunderstood the letter I addressed to him trying to correct him, after which he still reiterated that $302,000,000 would be the result of the proposed legislation?

Mr. WILSON. I speak not from having the ear of General Black, but largely from the answer to your letter which you quoted. The first question asked by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was:

> What has been the cost to the Government to date as the result of the passage of the acts of January 25 and March 3, 1879, extending the limitation in the filing of applications for pension, and what will be the probable expenditure under the operation of said acts without regard to the second proposition?

The Commissioner answers, as to the first, $179,404,872.96, and that there are now pending in the Pension Office claims, undisposed of but filed before the limitations on the arrears act became operative, which will probably call for a payment of $80,000,000.

Now that question was: What has been the cost to the Government to date, &c.? Then comes the second question:

> What will be the probable cost, if Congress repeals the limitations imposed by said acts of January 25 and March 3, 1879?

The Commissioner understood that to mean—what will have to be paid from this time forward, supposing such a repeal to be made, upon cases in your office, and answered correctly, $302,000,000; whereas I perfectly agree with my friend from Iowa that the cost of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] would be, on the basis of claims already filed, $80,000,000 less than that; that is to say, $222,000,000.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that this missumming up, if I may so call it, which includes $80,000,000 of what the gentleman in vigorous language has declared to be a ninety-three million dollar lie, was no falsehood but carried with it its own correction, on the face of the statement, and could mislead no one.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will it disturb the gentleman if I interrupt him?

Mr. WILSON. Not at all.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The gentleman makes the point that the Commissioner may have made a mistake. I made no complaint until I addressed him a letter, a letter prepared with care, and submitted to Mr. Courts, the clerk of the committee, getting his aid to make it clear and forcible, and the Commissioner of Pensions still would not yield or take back his error, but insisted, in answer to my question, that $302,000,000 would be the result of the passage of the pending bill. Now, if the gentleman desires to do me justice in this debate, let him tell this House and the country why the Commissioner of Pensions reiterated and held to his position after I had so emphatically and kindly brought his error to his attention?

Mr. WILSON. In answer to that I point the gentleman to the letter written by the Commissioner of Pensions on the 5th day of February, in which he answered each one of those questions separately, a letter which was published by direction of the Committee on Appropriations, and a copy thereof mailed to every member of this House, in which letter the Commissioner says that the net additional cost to the Government which the proposed repeal of the limitation act of 1879 will entail is $222,368,100.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The gentleman reads, does he not, from the letter which was written to fix up the record after we had the Commissioner in the Committee on Appropriations and had dislodged him from his fallacious position?

Mr. WILSON. I read, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. You read from letter number two, do you not?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the Commissioner of Pensions had had any purpose to deceive this House or to exaggerate these figures, so as to alarm Congress and the country, would he have submitted to the House in his first letter the basis of his calculation? Would he have given us the figures and the mathematical calculations themselves so that anybody could verify them or see the mistake if there was a mistake? Sir, the Commissioner of Pensions, so far from making any effort of that kind, has declared himself, in his annual report, in favor of the repeal of the limitation on the arrears act—a declaration which I fail to find in the reports of his predecessor, if there is any merit in that.

The Commissioner of Pensions further confines his calculation to the claims now pending in the Pension Office without taking into account the claims to be filed in the future, while the record shows that forty thousand claims were filed last year, and further shows that when the act of January 29, 1879, was passed it so stimulated the filing of claims that the number ran up from about fifty-seven thousand to one hundred and forty thousand the following year. So that, instead of the suggestion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] being correct, that not over $150,000,000 would be needed to meet the cost of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE], the $202,000,000 would be required to meet it in cases already pending in the Pension Office. There are two hundred thousand rejected pension cases, about 10 or 15 per cent. of which it is calculated will yet be allowed, and there is also an indefinite number yet to be filed in the future, which go to swell the probable amount and to show that the aggregate may even reach $100,000,000 more than the estimate of Commissioner Black.

But the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], taking the mathematical calculations of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS], insists that there is also a mistake of $13,000,000 in the figures of the Commissioner, because the Commissioner calculated that the claims filed prior to June 30, 1880, and therefore entitled to arrears under the law, would be entitled to an average of $1,500 apiece as arrears, calculated on the basis of $100 a year—but, when he comes to calculate the one hundred and seventy odd thousand claims now pending, he increases the average of arrears to $1,800 instead of $1,500. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MCCOMAS] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] claim that here is an additional mistake of $13,000,000. Why, sir, when the claims filed before July, 1880, and therefore entitled to fifteen years' arrears, are thrown into the general mass of claims since filed, forty thousand of which were filed last year, and would therefore call for arrears for twenty years, we see at once that the average changes, and that the Commissioner was justified in taking eighteen years as the average, instead of fifteen, and the thirteen million-dollar "mistake" discovered by these gentlemen vanishes into thinnest air.

The only other attack upon the Commissioner to which I will allude now is the singular one made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. PERKINS], when he asked the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER]: "Is the gentleman aware that the present Commissioner of Pensions has kept Republican members of Congress standing in the anteroom while he was conferring with Democratic members as to who should be discharged?" Did my friend from Kansas desire to be invited into that conference? Had he not rather remain in the anteroom than go in and participate in such a conference with the Commissioner of Pensions? I have no doubt, sir, that if he disclosed all that rests upon his political conscience he could a tale unfold that would mightily help the deliberations of such a conference. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield to me for a word?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. I made that inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio while he was descanting upon the beauties of the reforms inaugurated by the present administration and contrasting it with its predecessor, and I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] now if he ever knew a Republican Commissioner of Pensions keep a member of Congress waiting while he was conferring with his political associates as to who should be discharged from office.

Mr. WILSON. Why, sir, I suppose that in September, October, and November, 1884, when Mr. Commissioner Dudley was in Ohio and Indiana conducting the political campaign a great many Democrats may have been kept waiting to see him. [Laughter.]

Mr. PERKINS. But did not Commissioner Dudley differ from the present Commissioner in this particular, that he resigned his office when he determined to engage in politics?

Mr. WILSON. He resigned to take effect on the 10th day of November, after the Presidential election. I say, sir, I do not blame the Commissioner of Pensions for not allowing my friend to come into conference. I do not blame him for fearing these Kansas "Greeks," even "bearing presents." But I think the general sentiment of the people of this country will commend the Commissioner of Pensions for holding these conferences; I suggest that it would be a gratification to the Democratic people of the country if such conferences took place more frequently, and they commend the example of the Commissioner, in this respect, to other officers in charge of high Departments of this Government.

I believe as firmly in civil-service reform as any man in this country, but I do not believe the way to reform a partisan civil service is to preserve it in amber.

I see the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CUTCHEON] has just come in; and I turn aside a moment from the line of my remarks to call attention to a statement of his in the course of this debate. He states on page 1747 of the RECORD the number of invalid-pension claims allowed up to this time as amounting to 531,000. Now, my friend from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND], who opened the debate on this bill, said that not one-tenth of the soldiers of the Army had yet been placed upon the pension-roll. I find here a calculation of Mr. Dudley, the late Commissioner of Pensions, in his report for 1882, who had verified his examinations by the records, that counting re-enlistments, the number of soldiers upon the roll during the last war, was a little more than 2,000,000, I believe 2,063,000, and the statement of the gentleman from Michigan would show that more than one-fourth of these have been placed upon the pension-roll, a fact which I do not quote with the view of criticising that statement, but to call attention to a subsequent remark made by him, when, in answer to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WARNER], he said that about half of these pensioners were Democrats.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If I said that 531,000 pension claims had been allowed I misspoke; I meant to say that number of claims had been filed.

Mr. WILSON. The language of the gentleman is, "531,000 invalid pensions have already been granted."

Mr. CUTCHEON. I did not intend to say that. The number of invalid-pension claims filed is, I think, between 530,000 and 540,000—probably nearer the latter number than the former. I spoke simply from general recollection.

Mr. WILSON. A further statement of the gentleman was that about one-half of these pensioners were Democrats. Now, I have heard all my life that the great mass of the Federal Army was composed of our friends on the other side, that it was only a peculiar fragment of the Democratic party that was "roped into" the service. Now, it would seem supposing the Democratic soldiers in the Federal Army not to have been as numerous as the Republican, that they must, in common phrase, have done the "heft" of the fighting or so many would not have got wounded and crippled and killed. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to another point in the speech of my friend from Iowa, which he said he approached with reluctance; and I know that a man of his generous impulses must have approached such a line of argument with genuine reluctance. I refer to that part of his speech where he commented upon the vote on this side of the House upon the bill passed, some weeks ago, to increase widows' pensions from $8 to $12 a month. Turning to that vote he had read from the Clerk's desk the names of 66 Democrats who voted in the negative, and he had added to each name the locality from which the gentleman came; and when he found that of those 66 members 64 came from the States of the South, he used this emphatic language:

When 64 members upon that side of the House, all from the South, said that $12 were too much to pay a widow, I say that the sectional lines were kept up and the bloody shirt was unfurled in our faces.

Mr. Chairman, who originally fixed the widows' pension at $8 a month? It was fixed by the party upon the other side of this House while war was flagrant in the land, when the losses were freshest and the needs of the widows were sorest; and it was fixed at $8 a month when the currency of this country was not half so valuable as it is to-day.

Mr. MORRILL. Was not the rate of $8 per month fixed in 1816?

Mr. WILSON. Not the rate for widows' pensions. As I understand, this pension was not fixed until 1862. I may be mistaken about that; but I am proceeding on that assumption, that widows were not included in the pension-list until that time. You gentlemen on the other side made the law that placed widows upon the pension-list; you fixed the amount at $8 a month. During all the years of the war, during all the subsequent years when your control was supreme in every department of the Government, you kept that pension at that sum. In the Forty-seventh Congress, when once again you came into power in this House, you maintained this pension at that rate. Yet when sixty-four gentlemen on this side of the House voted that this pension of $8 a month—worth now $16 of the currency that you originally voted to these widows—was in their judgment sufficient, the gentleman from Iowa says that they "unfurled the bloody shirt in the faces" of his friends. Why, gentlemen, the banner which they unfurled in the faces of your friends is the banner that you unfurled and kept unfurled in the faces of the widows and orphans of the soldiers. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I know that in dealing with this question I am treading upon ashes beneath which fires may yet be smouldering. It was my fortune to exchange the books of a school-boy for the equipments of a private soldier and to follow, in that humble capacity, the flag of my State against the flag of my country, but I will say to the gentleman that he will go no further than I will in voting everything that is just, everything that is fair, everything that consists with the faith and the liberality of this country to the soldiers who fought in behalf of this Government. Sir, I regretted to hear the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE], in the course of his remarks the other day, comment, with some bitterness, on the fact that at one or two points in the South, the people had reared modest memorials to their dead soldiers. Sir, such an utterance does not become a magnanimous man. Such an utterance scarcely comports with the brave and manly character of the gentleman from Maine.

It is true the Southern people, here and there, have erected humble monuments over the graves of their sons, their brothers, and their fathers. It is true that they meet when spring comes to fling on those graves the choicest flowers of their section. [Applause.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir. But they do it in no spirit of disloyalty to their country. There is no influence brooding above those graves to kindle any such flames in their bosoms.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I trust the gentleman will allow me.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir. The men who sleep beneath that sod are not the men to come back, even if they could, with weakly lamentations and whisperings of revenge. They do not come, like the phantom hosts of Admiral Hosier, to vex the ears of friends and survivors with repinings. Those survivors discharge a duty for which no man should upbraid them, and for which every brave man ought to respect them. They can, from that sod which to them is sacred ground, appeal to the Searcher of all hearts and declare they cherish neither purpose, wish, nor imagination that does not throb for the glory and the greatness of the American Union. [Applause.]

Sir, as I go back in memory once again to take my place, an humble private in those half-clad, half-fed, but uncomplaining ranks, as I plunge once again into the stifling smoke of the Wilderness, or listen to the swelling diapason of the artillery about the Crater, as I gaze on the ashen faces of the dead, drink in the delirium of the wild yell that signaled the advancing column, or feel the awful death-like stillness that settled over the sullen and defiant retreat, I encounter no influences, I catch no voice, I feel the kindling of no sentiment that does not urge me in the position I now occupy to do my whole duty to my country and to every section of it. [Applause.] As I look back to that dread panorama, after the lapse of twenty years, I see, or I seem to see, but the stately stepping of that Providence which was using the wrath of man to work out its own comprehensive and beneficent purposes.

The institution of slavery was the baleful heritage which came down to us from our fathers. For its introduction and perpetuation no one section of this country was more responsible than another. In the growth and development of the country economic considerations fastened it upon one section and freed the other sections from it; so it came to pass if to the people of the South to hold on to it seemed death, to let it go seemed also death. It had become so wrought into the social and political organism of our body-politic that, in my humble judgment, nothing less than the heroic surgery of a great civil war could eradicate it. The immedicable wound would yield to nothing but the sword, and the sword pierced very near to the nation's heart; but if the anguish is over, if the wound is healing, what wisdom, what patriotism, what magnanimity in seeking to make it bleed afresh?

Mr. Chairman, the time has come, and I agree with my friend from Iowa, the time has come when we of the South not less than men of the North rejoice in the substantial results of the war. [Great applause.] We feel, no less than you do, those results were worth all the sacrifice necessary to secure them. The immense treasure poured out by the North, with its precious expenditure of human life, the immense treasure poured out by the South, with its precious expenditure of human life, its draught of the bitter cup of defeat, whose awful bitterness no one can know who has never tasted of it, have purchased not the mere preservation of the Union; that was the prime object but the least result of the war. Greater than the preservation of this Federal Union was the extinction of the institution of slavery, and greater than the extinction of the institution of slavery is the total annihilation of every ground, occasion, or excuse for further sectional division or sectional hate. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Amen, and amen, I will say to that, Brother WILSON.

Mr. WILSON. I knew you would; there never could be any ill feeling between the gentleman from Iowa and myself.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I know that; and I want that acted on by your friends.

Mr. WILSON. My friend, let me say to you that we do act upon it. That is the feeling which animates us; we try to have you understand that there is for all of us identity of feeling, identity of interest, identity of fortune, North and South [applause]; that there is for us one common career of greatness or of disaster, of glory or of shame.

Henceforth there is for the people of the North and the people of the South no rivalry, except the generous emulation as to which shall contribute most efficiently to the glory and prosperity of the country, and which shall most worthily contribute toward the stability of our institutions, the preservation and transmission to posterity of the liberties we enjoy. [Applause.]

But, Mr. Chairman, I come now to what after all seems to me to be the key-note of the speech of my distinguished friend from Iowa. All before this is matter of inducement; I come now to what is the real object, as I understand it, of his argument. The intent of his speech is plain. Descanting in just and eloquent phrase, to which we could all respond upon this floor, on the debt of the country to its soldiers, a debt and an obligation it is the pride of the people to bear without measuring too closely its burden upon the public Treasury, he turns to the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means and uses this language:

I would say to that committee go slow in reducing taxes.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Finish my sentence, Friend WILSON.

Mr. WILSON. That is all of the sentence.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No, sir; take it in connection with the context.

Mr. WILSON. I will read the gentleman's exact language from the RECORD:

That is my policy, and I caution gentlemen of the Ways and Means Committee: gentlemen, go slow in reducing taxes.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Yes; go slow in connection with the idea which I had been discussing before, that you may not deprive those who are entitled to it of that which is justly their due.

Mr. WILSON. No; the gentleman did not say that. He was discussing the tariff then. [Laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No; I was showing the necessity of preserving our ability to pay what is due to the soldiers.

Mr. WILSON. You were making a speech on the tariff, as I will show.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I beg your pardon——

Mr. WILSON. Let me read further what the gentleman says:

First make sure of what you are about, read the reports of your Government before you go further. Make Johnny Bull pay for the privilege of coming into the rich markets of America to transact his business in competition with our home producers.

Is not that tariff talk? [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Yes, to that extent; but in order that you might not cripple yourselves so that you could not pay the pensions which you owed to our soldiers.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I hope I shall not be offensive if I say that it seems to me that the sole remaining mission of the old party that lags superfluous on the stage, is to resist the reduction of taxes. [Applause and laughter.] Its very good masters, and our very good masters, whom in the long stretch of your vicious fiscal policy you have taken into partnership with the Government in levying taxes upon the people, force you to go slow in the reduction of taxes. What matter to them that the same grave burdens of taxes oppress the people to-day that they took upon their shoulders in the stress of a great war and in the spirit of patriotic sacrifice which then animated them? Their cry is still the one echoed by the gentleman from Iowa, "Let us go slow in the reduction of taxes." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, what boots it to those gentlemen that distress stalks abroad in all the land to-day? What boots it that there are so many thousands and tens of thousands of the laboring men of the country who find the struggle for bare necessities of life becoming harder and harder every day? What boots it that the specter of want has this very winter taken his seat, an unbidden guest, by the fireside of hundreds of thousands of the toiling men of the country who ask not charity or alms, but for the bare privilege, before God, of getting an honest day's work at an honest day's pay. Go slow in the reduction of taxes! [Loud applause.]

Mr. Chairman, as I read the history of liberty, resistance to illegal and excessive taxation has been the mother of free government. Out of this resistance has been evolved, if I may use the expression, these very institutions which we now enjoy. I am not here to-day, or at any other time, to suggest a change in the fiscal system of the country; but I say that the danger to our institutions to-day exists in the fact that Federal taxes are indirect, insidious, and hidden. They come to the home of every man in the country, no matter how humble he may be, how destitute he may be of the common necessities of life, that they may exact from him their daily tribute. There is no hut in all this land so humble that from it a contributory rivulet does not flow into the great stream that brings this $300,000,000 into the Federal Treasury. [Applause.]

Ah, Mr. Chairman, if there could be presented to the laboring men of this country, to those men that are to-day organizing themselves into associations, conscious of a great hurt and perhaps not always knowing the sources of it, if there could be presented to each one of these men a plain statement, at the end of every year, of the taxes exacted from him, the taxes that have come into the Federal Treasury, the taxes that have gone into the private coffer, we should see a change in the tone of discussion in this House and a change in the method of dealing with public moneys. Not even the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], bold and courageous as he is, would dare to ring over this assembly the command, "Go slow in the reduction of taxes;" he would rather like all the rest of us say, "Go slow in the expenditure of taxes." [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I have said what was the lingering mission of the party represented by the gentleman from Iowa. The day is coming when that last citadel at the other end of this Capitol which it still holds, a citadel, where I fear corporate influence and the power of wealth are stronger than the voice of the people, will pass away from it, and it will sink into the grave of dead and buried parties and the moss will gather upon its tombstone. Then my friend from Iowa—and nobody will be better entitled to perform that pious task than he—will come as Old Mortality to remove the moss and renew its epitaph, and I fancy the inscription over which he will bend with most tenderness, and carve again with greatest distinctness, will be that which recites a truth that no man will ever controvert—that in all its history the old party went "slow in the reduction of taxes." [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. WILSON, at the conclusion of the above remarks, yielded what remained of his time to Mr. MATSON.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from West Virginia has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. TOWNSHEND. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana to reserve his five minutes until he can get his hour.

Mr. MATSON. I am wholly indifferent as to that. I am willing to proceed now with what I have to say, although in five minutes it will be impossible for me to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. At the end of the five minutes the Chair is to recognize the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. RYAN].

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall ask at the end of the five minutes to be recognized with the object simply of yielding my time to my colleague so that he may proceed continuously.

Mr. RYAN. I have no objection to that arrangement.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, I think that the savage assault made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] upon the Commissioner of Pensions in relation to the letters that had been written by him to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was entirely unjustifiable. The Commissioner of Pensions insists that the figures that are given by him in the first letter, which the gentleman from Iowa criticises, are absolutely correct. He insists, and the letters show the facts to be, that he stated as the total result—not the cost—of the repeal of the limitation the sum of $302,000,000 with some odd figures. He insists that that is absolutely true, because there must be that much money expended on account of arrears if the arrears limitation act is repealed. And so he maintains that that proposition is correct.

The charge of the gentleman from Iowa that the Commissioner of Pensions in making this statement embodied a lie in it is a pretty broad and serious charge, and one that ought not to be made unless it appears by the paper itself that the Commissioner of Pensions did intend to mislead the country and to mislead the House upon this proposition. There is no evidence of anything of the kind. There is no evidence either that the Commissioner of Pensions attempted to intimidate the House or intimidate the country upon this proposition. On the contrary, I think the gentleman from Iowa knew that the Commissioner of Pensions in his annual report had stated an argument in behalf of the repeal of the limitations of the arrears act. I think he knew too that he subsequently testified before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, on the 9th of February, long before the gentleman from Iowa saw fit to make this charge in the House. I think he must have known the Commissioner of Pensions presented an argument there stronger perhaps than any other ever presented on the subject.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly I will; because I want to know whether you knew it.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Since the gentleman refers to what I knew as going on in the committee, or rather with members of the committee, I will frankly state that I heard repeated, after Commissioner Black gave these figures, which I could not drive him from until I got him into the committee-room—I did hear that the Democratic chiefs of this House, the leaders of the Democracy in this House, brought all their influence to bear upon the Committee on Invalid Pensions to keep them from reporting the bill for the arrearages of pensions. That I heard, and that I admit to my friend from Indiana.

Mr. MATSON. So far as that is concerned, Mr. Chairman, I want to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN was recognized, and gave his time to Mr. MATSON.

Mr. MATSON. I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa that so far as any influence is concerned, brought to bear by the Democratic chiefs of this House, whoever they are, whether it came from high or low sources, the Committee on Invalid Pensions has stood by the proposition, as it stood before this letter was written, and all the time and all the way through.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MATSON. I will.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. In my remarks on Thursday last I said, as the gentleman will bear testimony, that I did not believe that those influences would intimidate the committee of which he is the honored chairman.

Mr. MATSON. There. Then that matter is disposed of. But why does the gentleman want to escape from the proposition that I make? Why does he seek to divert the attention of the House from the consideration of this question as to what General Black has done and whether the gentleman himself has acted fairly toward General Black? Why does he avoid that question and lug in this proposition about somebody else? I ask him whether he did not know that General Black had expressed himself in favor of this repeal of the restriction in the arrears act?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman. I say that after General Black, in the kindliest manner, had had his attention squarely called to his misstatement of figures, and had allowed his official position to be used by abler brains and subtler minds to try to kill this movement to pass an arrearage-of-pensions law, I arraigned him for having struck with a mailed hand his comrades of the Army whom he had professed in his report to befriend, and I retract nothing, for I stand on solid ground.

Mr. MATSON. Still the gentleman refuses to say whether he did not know the fact that General Black had made this recommendation in his report.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Not when I made my remarks.

Mr. MATSON. The fact remains that General Black did recommend in his annual report the repeal of the limitation, and that he was the first Commissioner of Pensions that ever did recommend it. I will send an extract from his report to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I understand what his report is very well. You are right about that.

Mr. MATSON. Because the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] chooses to assume that General Black has made a mistake, he sees fit to arraign him here and charge him with hypocrisy and double dealing with the soldiers of the country. I ask now that this extract from the report of the Commissioner of Pensions be read, to show his real position on this question.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Commissioner respectfully calls attention to the widespread feeling that the limitation imposed by section 2 of the act of March 3, 1879, is unjust in its operations. If a soldier was entitled to a pension at any time prior to the 1st of July, 1880, no good reason is known to exist why he should not now be allowed to make proof thereof and establish his title thereto, under such restrictions and conditions as the wisdom of Congress may direct. This suggestion relates only to rights then existing by reason of disabilities, and not to the declaration or creation of new rights; it relates only to the remedy conferred and concerns only the question of a limitation in the prosecution thereof.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, there is General Black's recommendation as Commissioner of Pensions, there is his conduct all the way through, and I submit it to this House and this country to justify him against any assault that may be made upon him by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], who has accused him here of striking his comrades with a "mailed" hand or a "maimed" hand—I do not know which the gentleman said—for both General Black's hands are maimed so that he can not use them because of wounds received in two distinct engagements. [Applause.] I do not know whether there beats in General Black's breast a heart which sympathizes with his fellow-soldiers; perhaps the gentleman from Iowa knows better than I; but I believe—I believe because General Black has shown by his conduct not only in relation to this question but in his whole administration of the Pension Office that he is the true friend of all honorably discharged Union soldiers. [Applause on the Democratic side.] More claims have been allowed, more work has been done with less complaint from the soldiers of the country, during his administration than ever before during the administration of any Commissioner of Pensions since the war, and no politics dragged into it either. [Renewed applause on the Democratic side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, that is all I have to say upon that proposition; and I really did not intend to say anything, because I thought that my friend from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] had said all that needed to be said much better than I could. General Black is further assailed here because he stated in this same report that the Pension Office had been "all but avowedly a political machine." Mr. Chairman, I propose to leave out those three words "all but avowedly," and make it a plain simple proposition. I say that the Pension Office was a political machine during the campaign of 1884, and I propose to prove it. Understand I do not charge Colonel Dudley with having allowed a single claim that was not proven because the claimant was a Republican: I do not charge him with having refused to allow a single claim that was proven because the claimant was a Democrat. I do not charge that. I do not believe Colonel Dudley would do that. But that is not the charge which General Black makes. More than that, he does not even mention Colonel Dudley, nor mention the Commissioner at all. But I propose to show that the Pension Office was used as a political machine, and I think it was a political machine because of the example set by the then Commissioner of Pensions.

I was a candidate in 1884 for the seat which I now hold in this House. Hon. George W. Grubbs, a Republican, was the candidate against me. The district was supposed to be tolerably close. I have read the testimony taken by the Warner investigating committee, and on page 49 I find the testimony of the chief of the division, in which all the claims of Indiana soldiers are adjudicated. That chief says——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. What is the page?

Mr. MATSON. Page 49, beginning at the bottom of the page. John M. Comstock, the chief of that division, says that during that campaign Colonel Dudley directed him to treat this gentleman, Mr. Grubbs, who was a candidate against me, with the same courtesy that he would a member of Congress, and that in pursuance of these instructions every privilege accorded to a member of Congress was given to Mr. Grubbs, and that no such order was ever given for anybody else; no other candidate for Congress who was not a member was allowed such privileges.

Now I did not come here to complain about these things. I have no grievances at all. I do not desire to bring any personal grievances before the House. But I come here with this evidence to show that there was politics in the management of the Pension Office at that time. Colonel Dudley himself, if I may be allowed to call the attention of my colleague to the fact, testifies substantially to the same thing on page 243 of this report.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Two hundred and sixty-three is the page.

Mr. MATSON. Two hundred and forty-three is the number I have on my memorandum, but 263 is probably correct. At any rate I refer to Colonel Dudley's testimony, whatever may be the page.

That is not all that was done. I have here in the letter-book which Colonel Dudley himself kept in the office—the official letter-book—his letter to Major Grubbs, in which he says that he sent him two packages of these slips upon which to make calls, treating him exactly as if he were a member of Congress.

Now, I do not care anything about this matter so far as I am concerned. It is all over; and I may perhaps be allowed to say that it did not have the desired effect.

I want to go a step further in reference to that campaign. Major Grubbs, who was the Republican candidate for Congress, resided at Martinsville, the geographical center of the district I represent.

During the month of June, just before Congress adjourned, I applied at the Pension Office to have a board of examining surgeons established at Martinsville. That request was peremptorily refused. Now let us see what happened. I have here the original letter written by Major Grubbs——

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. My colleague will permit me to suggest that the Executive did not furnish that in response to any request on the part of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. MATSON. No, sir; in response to my request—being a private paper I suppose. Here are the letters of Major Grubbs. I want to read them. Mark you, the Commissioner, Colonel Dudley, had refused at my request to establish a board of examining surgeons at Martinsville.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. I suggest to my colleague that he send all the letters to the Clerk to be read.

Mr. MATSON. I will read them myself. I have here a letter written by Major Grubbs——

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Your opponent.

Mr. MATSON. My opponent. The letter is dated Martinsville, Ind., August 13, 1884:

Col. W. W. DUDLEY:

The best thing that could be done for me in this district, where I need it most, is the appointment of a board of medical examiners at this point. Soldiers of all the counties adjacent are urging it, and have their hearts set upon it. If it could be secured, presumably through any efforts of mine, it would greatly benefit me.

[Laughter on the Democratic side.]

I certainly need every aid that can be afforded, and with it I think I can win

[Renewed laughter.]

Now, let us see what Colonel Dudley said in reply. I have here his reply, dated August 16, 1884. I read from his letter-book:

Hon. GEORGE W. GRUBBS, Martinsville, Ind:

DEAR SIR: Your favor of the 13th at hand. I have directed that your inquiries in regard to pension cases shall have prompt attention. As to the establishment of a board of surgeons at Martinsville, I will have the matter canvassed by my medical referee as soon as possible, and if practicable it shall be done.

[Laughter.]

You need not be assured that my best wishes are for your success.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Yes, but he did not succeed.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have no unkind feeling for Colonel Dudley. He knows that. Although all this was done, I was disposed to say no more about it, to let it go; and even when General Warner's committee was in session he knows I did not bother about it at all, and did not give him or any member of the committee any information. Once they discovered something in my district, but it was a matter I cared nothing about until it was stated here that General Black had charged upon Colonel Dudley that which could not be proved. I thought it could be. I made here a plain statement of the fact. What did it show? Let us go a step farther. Mr. Grubbs got the board, and the Pension Office now contains slips showing that he asked men to be sent to Martinsville to be examined, and he did not want them to go anywhere else. The board was organized promptly—long before the election.

What else? There are six witnesses who testified before General Warner's committee that it was directed in the Pension Office that no rejections should be made; that this order was given in September, 1884, and that no rejections ever were made until after the election. It was well understood all through that office that this order was made for the purpose of preventing voters from taking offense at the Republican party. Here are the names of the six witnesses who testify on this point (I ask my colleague to take a note if he wishes): William Smith, page 35; J. D. Fardon, page 38; William T. Fisher, page 42; Edwin L. Chapman, page 43; Charles F. Rundell, page 48; and T. F. Kinney, page 46.

There they are, these witnesses who say that no rejections whatever were permitted in the divisions in which they were at work in order that they might not give offense to voters, and thus induce them to vote the Republican ticket. Not only that; here was the fact, the great, controlling fact. The reason why the Pension Office became a political machine was because Colonel Dudley left it, not resigning, but carrying it over the election—leaving the office and resigning as Commissioner, but carrying the resignation over until after the election and going into the State where the battle of the campaign was supposed to be fought.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Did he not leave it in charge of Colonel Clark, and did not Colonel Clark testify before that same committee he was a Democrat?

Mr. MATSON. I presume he did not.

Mr. ROGERS. If the gentleman from Indiana will permit me I will answer the question.

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS. He did not testify he was a Democrat.

Mr. MATSON. Colonel Dudley went to Ohio Nobody denies that. You say he was not acting as Commissioner. Let us see whether he was or not. What did he do on the 5th of September, 1885? Why did he send this to E. G. Rathbone, chief of the special examination division, that vast machine of special examinations by which all this work was done? Why did he send this dispatch if he was not acting as Commissioner of the Pension Office:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, 9, 5, 1885. (September 5.)

To E. G. RATHBONE, Care Colby:

Send Noble to Durnan for the present at once.

W. W. DUDLEY, Commissioner.

It is signed, as you see, W. W. Dudley, Commissioner. Noble was special examiner, and Dudley was exerting his power as Commissioner in directing the movement of these men, and, as I have already shown by this testimony, for political ends. It will be observed he signs his name as Commissioner.

More than that. On the 16th of October Colonel Dudley returned to Washington and resumed his place at the desk of the Commissioner for a week or more. Talk of his resigning! Listen to what is uttered under oath by one of the employés then in the Pension Office.

Afterward, about the middle of October, Colonel Dudley returned from Ohio, and on arriving at the Pension Office was generally congratulated upon the success he had met with in the management of the Ohio campaign. Deponent is unable to name the various parties who made these congratulations; it was almost in the shape of a levee; it was in the main building, on the corner of Twelfth street and the Avenue, and at the time deponent met and spoke with Colonel Dudley there was quite a little crowd, probably fifteen or twenty people, and more coming and going.

Deponent states that in reply to these congratulations Colonel Dudley said that they had done well there, and it was a good precursor of the election to ensue.

He came back to Washington, not for the purpose of assuming the duties of his office as Commissioner of Pensions, but in order to be congratulated for his success in Ohio! That is why he did it, is it? Does that look as if he acted as Commissioner or not? He came back after the Ohio campaign and was congratulated in the very office of the Commissioner of Pensions for what he did. It was that pernicious influence of Colonel Dudley to which I refer.

Mr. STEELE. Colonel Dudley's family was here. He made up his mind to live here, and he does live here. It was natural that he should come back here.

Mr. MATSON. He made up his mind before. He testified before the committee that his legal residence was in the State of Indiana, and perhaps he wanted to go back there to take the same part that he did in 1880, along with Dorsey and the rest. In 1884 he went to Ohio and there exercised his splendid powers in the organization of the politics of that State. I make no more criticism than this, that he is such a bitter, earnest, intense partisan he could not keep out of politics if he would. I have only that to say about Colonel Dudley. It is a notorious fact. Yet you will assail General Black because he alludes to these things which are notorious and known to everybody.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. CUTCHEON. It is in regard to the examining board at Martinsville. Does the gentleman understand that it was established or not?

Mr. MATSON. It was at once.

Mr. CUTCHEON. Has it been discontinued?

Mr. MATSON. It has, except we have turned out some Republicans and put in some Democrats. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. CUTCHEON. The point I wish to get at is this, whether it was established, and, if established, whether it has been continued.

Mr. MATSON. Yes, it was established and it has been continued.

Mr. CUTCHEON. If the present administration continues it, then it does it because it was a good thing to establish it.

Mr. MATSON. I wish to call the attention of gentlemen to the facts about these boards. Here are the figures. There are now on the roster 2,227 examining surgeons. General Black has appointed altogether less than half—1,024.

Yes, Mr. Chairman, 2,227 altogether are on the roster, and less than one half of that number, or 1,024, have been appointed by General Black.

Now, General Black authorizes me to say that less than a hundred, perhaps not more than fifty, Democrats had been appointed on these boards of examining surgeons and as single surgeons prior to the time when he took possession of the Pension Office as Commissioner of Pensions.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Will the gentleman permit a question at that point?

Mr. MATSON. Oh, certainly.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I would like to ask him how the Commissioner of Pensions ascertained the number of Republicans and Democrats occupying these positions.

Mr. MATSON. Well, I suppose he knows a Democrat from a Republican. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Especially as these men are scattered all over the United States.

Mr. MATSON. Very well; now just be still and I will tell you.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Oh! certainly I will.

Mr. MATSON. I do not mean to be disrespectful at all; but if the gentleman will just be patient I will give him the information.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And I want to ask in this connection——

Mr. MATSON. Let me answer one question before you begin another.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I only want to give you another one at the same time, so that you may consider both together.

Mr. MATSON. One at a time.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Very well.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman wants to know how General Black knows a Republican from a Democrat. Now, here is a document which I hold in my hand with Colonel Dudley's sign-manual appended to it. Here is the original instrument from which the circulars were printed, and under which these boards of surgeons were to be organized in pursuance of the act of 1882. Let me read a portion of that to the gentleman:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 6, 1882.

DOCTOR—

This, remember now, is the original article; it is not a copy, but the original, bearing the signature in writing of the Commissioner himself—

DOCTOR: Proposing to organize a board of examining surgeons in your city, I write to ask that you will give me a list of your most prominent physicians, from which to make the selection.

Then he goes on to prescribe what shall be their fitness; that they shall be selected because of their professional and personal standing, two of whom in connection with the party to whom the letter was addressed to constitute the board, and winds up with—

They should be Republican in politics.

[Laughter and applause.]

Does that answer the gentleman's question? Now do you not see how they could be recognized? I have not taken any printed circular from which to read this information for you, but here is the original document, with Colonel Dudley's name upon it, from which the printed circulars were made, prescribing as the important, essential qualification that they should be Republican in politics.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Now I hope the gentleman will answer the other question.

Mr. MATSON. Certainly, if you ask one at a time.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I want to ask the gentleman now if it is not understood that Commissioner Black, upon his accession to the office, gave out publicly that he proposed to organize the examining board on the basis of two Democrats to one Republican.

Mr. MATSON. He did. [Cries of "That was right!"]

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is not that true?

Mr. MATSON. Let me answer that.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Well, answer it.

Mr. MATSON. Now, he did it in every instance except perhaps in a half a dozen cases; one in the city of Cincinnati, where political feeling ran so high between the Republicans and Democrats that I presume he thought they could not work together, and I think that fact is so well known that it will hardly be denied and certainly my friend Mr. BUTTERWORTH, if present, would subscribe to it.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. If they had appointed a Republican the Democrats would have counted him out by a returning board. [Laughter.]

Mr. MATSON. Very likely; and if they did not the Republicans would, for they have a very mixed state of politics there.

But, Mr. Chairman, General Black made five or six exceptions; that is all. I asked him the question, and there are only five or six boards; whereas the board that contained a Democrat under Republican administration was an exceedingly rare exception. Is not that true? I have inquired all around me of my colleagues who reside in what may be called the pension district of the country, and every one of them with whom I have spoken tells me that in his district there were no Democrats on the board under the Republican administration. I remember my friend from Iowa, Colonel HEPBURN, said that there were some in Iowa. Some other gentleman made the same remark, but they were exceptions. Now, on the contrary, it is an exception where there is a board that has not a Republican on it under the Democratic administration.

Mr. Chairman, my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] saw fit in his speech the other day to assail this side of the House, and he seemed to take special pleasure in hitting a head wherever he could find one, except that he did not hit mine. I do not mean to say anything unpleasant about my friend or anybody else, but he saw fit to assail the members of this House who voted against the widows' pensions That did not do any good. That vote had been taken, and he might just as well have assailed General Grant because he vetoed the bill equalizing the bounties of soldiers. Just as well. That was a bill that was intended, and would by its operation have benefited more soldiers than any bill that has ever been seriously considered by Congress.

Why not, unless you wished to make political capital by your speech—why not assail all who from your standpoint had voted against the interests of the soldiers?

Mr. STEELE. I have introduced a similar bill before your committee, which I hope will give it favorable consideration.

Mr. MATSON. The gentleman has no such bill before our committee. Such a bill goes to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. STEELE. I beg your pardon. It has been referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. MATSON. If it has, it has been so by mistake. Nobody ever heard of it before. The Committee on Military Affairs has exclusive jurisdiction of that matter of bounty. And if it happens that this bill is before our committee, there are forty such bills before the Committee on Military Affairs, of which the gentleman from Indiana is a member.

Mr. STEELE. In the Forty-eighth Congress I had this bill referred to the Select Committee on Pensions, Bounty, and Back Pay. In this Congress no such committee was appointed, and I was told by the Speaker that it would properly go the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and it was so referred.

Mr. MATSON. That is neither here nor there. Why did not my friend arraign the Forty-seventh Congress? There was a whole Congress, Republican at both ends of the Capitol, that stood there two sessions and passed no bill for the benefit of the soldiers of the country except one to increase the pensions of one-armed and one-legged soldiers; and that was engineered through the House by the great and venerable man from Pennsylvania, Governor CURTIN. Why did you not assail that Congress if you wanted to hit heads as to what may or may not have been done?

Mr. STEELE. In that Congress I introduced a bill very late in the session and it was not acted on.

A MEMBER. Why did you introduce it so late in the session?

Mr. MATSON. It is impossible for me in the confusion to hear what the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] says. Allow me to hurry on, for I am occupying more time than I should. In relation to this arrears matter, that seems to be the red flag that aggravates my friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MATSON. Certainly.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will the gentleman kindly state whether he approves of the vote I referred to?

Mr. MATSON. What vote?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. The vote against the increase of the widows' pension.

Mr. MATSON. I approve of every man exercising his own judgment. [Applause.] I did not vote that way, of course. But I am not here to denounce a man for his vote because he did not agree with me.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Neither did I denounce them.

Mr. MATSON. Then there is no issue between us.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will you answer my question. Do you approve of that vote?

Mr. MATSON. Do you mean would I have voted that way? Why ask that question when I voted for the bill?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Ah! Are you defending that vote?

Mr. MATSON. I say those gentlemen had a right to vote as their conscience and judgment dictated.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. A ten-year old child knows that. Do you defend that vote?

Mr. MATSON. I am not called upon to defend it. They are able to defend themselves.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not want to embarrass the gentleman.

Mr. MATSON. I want to embarrass you about this arrear business. Give me a little chance to do that. [Laughter.] What has your party done in relation to arrears? Why, in the Forty-seventh Congress, when your party was in the majority in both ends of the Capitol, and the Executive, too, where was your measure you might have passed extending the benefit of the arrears act? Why did you not pass such a measure if in earnest about this thing? More than that: how is it your party met in national convention in 1884 and there solemnly declared to the people of this country that you were in favor of repealing that limitation in relation to the arrears of pension; and yet before that moon had changed, in that Republican Senate enough Republican votes were cast against the bill to forever kill it? And yet you stand here and say your party is the especial champion of this bill in relation to the arrears of pensions. Why is it that your Senate has not originated a measure of this kind—the Republican Senate? They have as much power as the House has. How is it that you are arraigning members of the Democratic side of this House as being derelict of their duty and let Republicans go scot free?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will my friend allow me?

Mr. HAMMOND. No, no.

Mr. MATSON. I have promised to yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND], and he objects. The gentleman from Iowa will have time to reply.

Now, I want to submit another proposition. My friend from Iowa championed the widows' bill, and I was glad to have him champion it, but I would have been better pleased if he had given it as much force when the bill was under consideration as he did afterward. He did not do much good then in the way of hitting heads.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Does the gentleman mean to intimate that I did not help the passage of that bill?

Mr. MATSON. You did help it by your vote.

Mr. HENDERSON. Did I not vote and speak for it?

Mr. MATSON. I say you spent your force about it after the thing was over.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. No, sir; on this floor I fought for that measure side by side with the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MATSON. If what I have said is offensive to the gentleman, I will say he did all he could for the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. I do not know that it matters much what the gentleman says about it, but I want the history of the matter to be correct.

Mr. MATSON. That is quite right. The gentleman was for it, and that is enough. But I still insist that he became much more vehement after the contest was over than while it was on. [Laughter.]

Now, then, that was a good bill. The gentleman and I will agree upon that proposition. That was a righteous bill. But I want to ask him if he does not know that the Republican Senate, by reason of holding that bill for more than a month, has deprived the widows of this country of more than half a million dollars which they might have received under it if the Senate had acted promptly upon the bill?

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. In answer to the gentleman's question I will say that I have inquired into that matter more than once, and have been informed that the reason of the delay is that the chairman of the Senate committee in charge of the bill, Senator MITCHELL, was absent on account of sickness. That is the reason given to me.

Mr. MATSON. Mr. Chairman, it is a poor excuse to say that one Senator out of forty-three Republican Senators can, by reason of his accidental sickness, deprive the widows of this country of the benefits of a bill when time is of the essence of the relief proposed. Here we have the last, and for that reason the hardest, month of the winter, when the widows of the country ought to have the benefit of that legislation, and would have it but for this delay on the part of the Republican Senate. Yet gentlemen arraign the Democrats of this House for dereliction of duty and have no word to say about the shortcomings of their own political brethren!

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. Will my friend still exercise his kindness so far as to permit me to ask him if he has not found that he has to practice a little delay in his committee on the arrears bill?

Mr. MATSON. No, sir; we are not delaying the bill.

Mr. HENDERSON, of Iowa. After it was agreed to be reported it was hung up in air for some time, was it not?

Mr. MATSON. No, sir; it is not hung up. As I have already stated, there never has been a single change in our committee in respect to that bill, and every member of the committee will tell you the same. The bill stands unchanged, except as to one or two little matters.

Mr. STEELE. If my colleague [Mr. MATSON] will allow me, I wish to make an explanation. I do not want to do him injustice, and on looking at my bill I find that when I said it had been referred to his committee I was mistaken. It was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

Mr. CURTIN. If the gentleman will allow me, I will add, for the satisfaction of the House and the benefit of the widows, that I trust that Senator MITCHELL is better. [Laughter.]

Mr. MATSON. Now, Mr. Chairman, figures of every kind have been made in relation to this subject, and some of us have figured in the speech of the gentleman from Iowa in one situation and some in another, but the next time he goes to make up his hell accounts and his damnation balances I want him to take into consideration this page of our legislative history, which shows this delay and dereliction of duty on the part of the Republican party in relation to legislation for the benefit of the pensioners of the country.

Mr. Chairman, I ask to have this circular issued by Commissioner Black in relation to the appointment of examining surgeons printed as a part of my remarks. I now yield the floor to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HAMMOND].

The circular of Commissioner Black is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., ——, 188-.

DEAR SIR: Upon the suggestion by reliable parties of proper surgeons for the various pension examining boards, there will be sent to each physician, so designated and subsequently selected by the Commissioner, Form No. 3-355, herewith inclosed, and also the blank "Personal Report," to be filled in and returned by the surgeon named for appointment. Upon the return of such report so filled in, if the medical and personal history of the candidate shall be found to be complete and satisfactory, a notice of appointment will be sent to the surgeons so selected, and also the blank oath prescribed by law, copies of which two last-named papers are herewith inclosed.

Upon compliance with the requirements set forth in said blanks, a formal appointment will be made out and the necessary routine orders for the organization of the board will be forwarded to each surgeon so chosen and appointed.

You ask what are the requirements which are deemed essential by the Commissioner of Pensions in the selection of examining surgeons. They are:

First. Appointees must be men of personal honor and integrity, for if the surgeons be lacking in these qualities, it is almost impossible to prevent numerous frauds being committed against the Government.

Second. They must be men of tried professional ability and experience, at least five years of active professional practice being considered essential.

Third. They must be men of diligence, men who would be unwilling to make a slip-shod examination in any case or subscribe to the work of others.

Fourth. Where the above requisites are combined, the Commissioner prefers the appointment of men who have been in the military service of the United States.

Boards to be organized and reorganized will consist in every case, where the above requisites can be combined, of two Democrats and one Republican, it being one of the aims of the Commissioner to strip this branch of the public service of all partisan bias, and to render these boards what they should be, safeguards to the public Treasury, as well as just witnesses to the rights of lawful claimants against the Government.

Boards will be established whenever the public interest demands. The increase in their number being no appreciable increase in expense, the pay being for each separate examination.

Very respectfully,

JOHN C. BLACK, Commissioner.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, so much better and more fully has the matter which I desired to present to the committee been presented by others this morning that I would have preferred that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MATSON] had gone on without publishing the fact that he had promised to yield the floor to me. There are, however, two points to which I desire to call the attention of the committee. I am very glad that the first will rest upon the background which has just been made. I have not the pleasure of the acquaintance of Mr. Dudley. I took it for granted that he was a distinguished gentleman, a man in every regard worthy, and had no idea that he had neglected his public duties when he was a Government official to the extent and for the purposes which have been proven in this debate.

He himself admitted in the testimony which has been alluded to, at page 264, that he absented himself from his office for sixty-one days for the purpose of conducting a political campaign. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BROWNE] who undertook to defend him when this bill was up before made no remark in his defense except that he had tendered his resignation before he left Washington, and that he only accepted the month's extra pay in consequence of great urging. Mr. Chairman, he tendered his resignation some time between the 5th and the 21st of September, to take effect on the 10th of November. During all that time, as we have it proved, he was away from his office attending to partisan politics. Some gentleman on the other side of the House asked if he was an "offensive partisan." That is exactly the picture of "offensive partisanship" drawn by the present Democratic Executive, and drawn always by the Democratic party.

I appeal to the history of the last Democratic administration, and ask the Clerk to read a letter written by Howell Cobb, when Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a request by an official in his Department that he might go to his home and make political speeches.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARCH 30, 1857.

DEAR SIR: I reply to your letter at once that you ma ynot misinterpret my silence into an approval of your suggestions. I do not think that a citizen loses his political identity or independence by accepting office under the Government. He does, however, commit himself to the service of the country to the utmost extent required for a faithful discharge of the duties of his position. His political associates ought not to expect of him any service to his party at the expense of his duty to the Government. Holding as you do an office of great pecuniary responsibility, and one requiring your constant personal attention, I can not sanction the propriety of your absence from your post for the purpose of an active engagement in the approaching election of your State.

No one regards with more interest than I do the success of the national Democratic party at this important period in our history. But that success must not be purchased at the expense of the public interest, which might be the case if those holding high and important offices should absent themselves from their posts to conduct the canvass. Regarding your letter in the light of an application for leave of absence, I have withheld my approval for the foregoing reasons.

Very respectfully,

H. COBB, Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HAMMOND. Mr. Chairman, such was the language of the Democratic party when it was heretofore in power; such has been proclaimed the principle of the Democratic party since it has again come into power. It has been declared that when a man becomes a public officer he may think what he pleases, say what he pleases, and do as he pleases, except that while he holds that public trust his services are to be given to the public and not to his party. The President of the United States says to the people to-day, as Jeremiah said to Israel offending, "Stand ye in the ways, and see, and ask for the old paths, where is the good way, and walk therein, and ye shall find rest for your souls."

Having given publicity to that piece of Democratic history, which the conduct of the Republican party has caused the world to forget for twenty-five years, I desire to say no more upon that line.

What I had further intended to say has practically been anticipated in an excellent manner by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON]. Yet because I have the dates I will go over them. I will first remark that prior to the late war widows' pensions were never fixed, as I remember, at so much per month. The practice from 1798 down to the time of the late war was to give to widows, for five years at a time, the half pay of their dead husbands; and in order, I suppose, that this provision might not be abused, the allowance was renewed in terms of five years. So the law stood up to July 14, 1862. On that day the Congress of the United States first passed the law which, among other things, fixed the pay of non-commissioned officers, privates, and musicians at $8 a month. In the second section of that law it was declared that in case of their death from wounds, &c., the widow should receive the same pay which had been allowed to the husband. That was the beginning, according to my recollection, of this allowance of $8 a month; and that was the answer to the question which I propounded in the debate when this bill was last before the House.

The first change as to widows' pensions was made June 6, 1866. On that day negro widows were put on the same footing as to pensions with the widows of white soldiers. On February 18, 1867, the pensions of widows of Revolutionary soldiers, married on or before the 1st day of January, 1800, were made equal to the pensions of widows of those who had served in the late war. On July 27, 1868, a pension at the rate of $8 a month was allowed to the widows of all Revolutionary soldiers. By act of February 14, 1871, the widows of the soldiers of the war of 1812 were allowed a pension at $8 a month provided they were married before the treaty of peace. In 1873 widows' pensions were increased after July, 1866, not by a direct allowance to the widow, but by an allowance of $2 a month for each child under sixteen years of age who was the child of the dead soldier.

I mention these things simply to show that although the subject of widows' pensions has been up half a dozen times since the war, no man ever proposed to increase those pensions until this Congress.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to correct his statement?

Mr. HAMMOND. Certainly.

Mr. BROWNE, of Indiana. During the last Congress the Senate appended to the Mexican-war pension bill an amendment by which the widows' pension was put at the same amount at which it is placed by the legislation recently passed in this House.

Mr. HAMMOND. And that was done with the express purpose of defeating the Mexican pension bill; nothing else. They knew and the gentleman knew that the measure could never be passed in that shape. When the session was nearly at an end an immense amount of pensions was piled on that deserving bill for the purpose of crushing it. Now, when money is worth, in everything that it takes to feed and clothe the widows of the soldiers, twice as much as it was when this rate of $8 a month was established, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] arraigns the Southern members of this House for voting against the increase, though his party has kept the pensions at $8 per month all this while.

I was in earnest when I moved to extend his time for the honorable mention of my name in that list.

These facts answer his argument. The stuff in his speech as that "the Constitution is thrown in our faces as a shield to cover an almost solid vote against that little pension bill" needs no answer. No constitutional question arose in that matter. The bitter gall in that speech against men whom he takes by the hand daily as his friends does not need reply. The spirit of the speech, not only in manner but in the cold printed words, carries its own condemnation. He needed no more reply when he himself consigned the confederates to hell and then intensified their hell by his expressed intention to be there with them. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. HOLMAN. If I have any time left I will yield it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SOWDEN].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; I will yield it to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. SOWDEN. Mr. Chairman, on the occasion when this debate was in progress, February 26, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] used the following language:

> Two-thirds of all the examining surgeons of this country—men of experience, the great majority of them comrades of the soldiers, equipped with knowledge and with a kindly feeling for applicants—were stricken down and men without experience put in their places, many of them civilians.

At that portion of the gentleman's remarks I sought to interrogate him, but he declined the courtesy requested. My intention was to refute these charges and insinuations made against the present Commissioner of Pensions.

In my district we knew of no such thing as a Democrat on these medical examining boards under Republican rule. After the entrance of General Black upon the discharge of his official duties as Commissioner of Pensions we found a reversal of the old tyrannical partisan organization of these boards. In their organization he appointed two Democrats and one Republican. What more fair? How can the gentlemen on the other side of the House complain, when under their management of this important branch of the public service they could find no room for Democrats upon these boards. My brave comrade from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON], who professes such a kindly feeling for the soldiers, does our brave comrade Commissioner Black a great injustice when he charges him with having stricken down two-thirds of all the examining surgeons of the country, and with having replaced them with inexperienced men, in the face of the facts to the contrary. He complains because civilians take the places of some of our brave comrades who were on these examining boards. Is this the fact? Let me assure my brave comrade from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] that in my district we have three brave comrades of ours on these boards, and two Republicans.

Why the necessity of assailing and imputing improper motives to the Commissioner of Pensions in the reorganization of the medical examining boards when he has organized them in so non-partisan a manner in the interest of fairness and justness to the soldiers who are applicants for pension. Certainly no honest claimant for pension will complain of the non-political character of the present boards, and no gentleman on the other side of the House should find fault with their complexion when he remembers that under Republican control there were no Democrats appointed to these places. Did not Commissioner Black give us this non-partisan examining board? Have we a right to ask or expect more of him?

Is it not fair to the applicants for pension? Is it not honorable and soldier-like on his part to recognize the two great political parties in the organization and constitution of these medical examining boards? Does this not give the applicants for pensions a fair and honest chance? Who will say that this is not an honest and honorable course on the part of the Commissioner of Pensions? Why then these unkind charges and unsoldierly insinuations? Gentlemen on the other side speak loudly of their love and affection for the brave soldiers who came out of the recent war, and yet have no hesitation to assail and impugn the motives of so brave and patriotic a soldier as Commissioner Black.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Mr. Chairman, it was not my expectation to take part in the debate upon this bill, and I rise with reluctance. I am glad to take the floor, however, because it has pleased certain gentlemen to refer to my district and to Hamilton County as the center of all that is iniquitous in politics, with a suggestion, by innuendo, that possibly Republicans were the sinners and I the deus ex machina there to work out the mischief. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, the bill before the House is one that will probably receive the support of every gentleman on this floor. Ordinarily it does not give rise to political discussion here, but it occurred when the bill was under consideration my honored friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] very appropriately called attention to certain facts, which had their birth in the consideration of this bill in committee, and which facts were given to the country, as he asserts, for a purpose, which he pointed out. It is the fact that pending the consideration of the arrears bill before the Committee on Invalid Pension, the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations addressed a letter to the Commissioner of Pensions asking for an estimate as to the amount which would be required to pay those who would be entitled to the arrears in case the bill should become a law. I do not question the necessity nor doubt the propriety of seeking such information.

But it was intimated that that inquiry had no other purpose than to prevent the committee from reporting the arrears pension bill favorably to the House. In other words, it is suggested that the country and this House were to be so startled by the array of figures and the colossal amount involved as to give them pause, even before entering upon the consideration of the measure. I do not say that that was the intention. I do say, if it was the intention it was exceedingly well-timed.

I do not charge the Commissioner of Pensions with willful intent to pervert the facts or to suppress the truth. We all know that there was in the statement an egregious error, an error of $93,000,000. The proposition being to pay arrears of pensions to those who might prove themselves entitled thereto, an inquiry was very properly directed to the Commissioner to ascertain the amount that would probably be required, so that gentlemen might intelligently judge whether the condition of the Treasury, the condition of the revenues of the country, would warrant such a beneficence, such a bounty—nay, not such a bounty, but such a measure of justice to the defenders of the Republic. There was a question as to whether the Commissioner of Pensions intended to mislead. I acquit him of an intention to mislead, nor do I believe he prepared the figures that were submitted to this House.

The numerous experts who have been so swift to pour into willing ears the scandals about the Pension Office are the persons who doubtless prepared and presented to the Commissioner the figures which he subsequently presented to the committee and the House. Those figures did mislead the House and did mislead the country, and my honorable friend from Iowa was justified and right in calling attention to that statement and criticising with some severity the carelessness that could permit so gigantic an error to pass undiscovered; and beyond that, that when discovered it should have been adhered to until the mischiefs, not possibly intended, but the inevitable mischiefs which did result and which must have resulted from scattering that gross misstatement broadcast throughout the country.

Mr. Chairman, another matter was referred to by the honorable gentleman from Iowa. He suggested to this House and to the country that he was, by such votes as were cast by gentlemen upon the other side upon the bill to increase the pensions of widows sometimes led to doubt whether there was indeed that fraternal feeling upon the part of our brethren upon the other side for which we are all longing and which we are seeking to cultivate.

There was a suggestion in his remark, not spoken in words, but its purport and effect was this: That the ashes of our dead had better still be guarded by those who went out with them to battle and who fought by their side in the ranks when they fell.

There was a suggestion that our friends upon the other side, having the feelings and impulses incident to our common humanity, might not be as swift to do the full measure of justice to the soldiers of the Republic as those from whose hearthstones those soldiers went forth to do battle. It was a natural intimation, the logic of admitted facts.

Nor by this statement did he, nor do I, call in question the right of one solitary individual to determine for himself how he shall vote, nor do I doubt the honesty of the judgment which controls that vote, whether it be cast for or against the measure.

Mr. OATES. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. OATES. If it was so desirable and righteous to increase the pension of widows from $8 to $12 a month, why did not your party do it while in full possession of both branches of Congress for twenty years after the war?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I am coming to that. Now, my friend from Alabama calls attention to our alleged shortcomings in this respect as a defense of the course so many of his friends on the Democratic side have been pleased to adopt.

Gentlemen, you will not forget that the country has been staggering under a grievous load; neither will you forget that as the years crept on the aged and infirm, who have heretofore claimed nothing of their country's bounty, now are willing to receive it, although they are not knocking at the doors of this Chamber to demand it. You must recognize the fact that with the waning years the boys and girls growing into manhood and womanhood left the hearthstones where they had been the prop and stay of aged parents.

Those who participated in the great civil conflict, who, once in the vigor of manhood, have come to a time when their strength has failed and their steps are now feeble and they naturally turn to the Republic, which their children saved, to ask it in prayer, if not in petition addressed to this House, to keep the promises that the young republic made when the boys went forth to do battle. No father, no husband, no son at the breaking out of the war, when called upon to do battle for his country, but heard ringing in his ears this call and promise from the Republic: "Go fight my battle and I will be husband to your widow if a widow she must be; I will be a father to the orphans if orphans they must be." And to this hour the young republic has, over your opposition, not by your willing aid, kept the faith. Like Elijah's ravens it has brought bread to the hungry, the feeble, the sick, and the old. Whatever the reason for this delayed justice it does not sound in want of devotion of this side of the House to the Union soldiers of the country. But suppose, for any purpose, good or bad, this generous bounty, this righteous justice had been withheld. What is that to you? Is that a reason why you should oppose it now?

Is that the reason you do not record more than half a hundred votes for it? If it is just and generous why withhold your votes? If the justice is tardy it comes at last with a solid vote on this side of the House and with a majority against it—possibly not a majority, but half the votes against it—upon that side of the House. I am not calling in question your right to exercise your judgment. It is your right. This is our common country and a free country, and no man should be trammeled in the exercise of his judgment here or elsewhere.

Mr. Chairman, I do not care to be led away from the line of discussion which I had intended to pursue, but pause here to wonder if I realize the exact truth as it is; the history we have written, the logic of recorded events.

If we may rely upon the statements made upon that side of the House the men who guarded this Republic in its hour of greatest peril, the men who tore the fingers of disloyalty one by one from the throat of the Republic, are not now to be trusted even to guard the ashes of their dead. To the tender solicitude of those who made pensions necessary in the hundred thousand homes of this country—to their tender mercies the widows, the orphans, the maimed and the crippled throughout the land are to look with generous and hopeful confidence rather than to those from whose firesides those saviors of the nation went forth in response to their country's call. A beautiful spectacle, is it not? A beautiful picture! [Applause.]

I do not, however, purpose to leave the consideration of the Pension Office just yet. I hold in my hand the last report of the Commissioner of Pensions. I do not know what men's lips may say or will say, but in defense of the manhood of both sides of the House I submit that no man can read the part of this report which discusses the character of the force in the Pension Office and Commissioner Black's predecessor without feeling ashamed of the heart that conceived and the pen that wrote it.

I have not time to read the report, but I call your serious attention to it, and in no partisan sense, but in the interest of decent administration. There seems not to have been an avenue of scandal in all the Pension Bureau that was not drained dry, and the files were ransacked in order to befoul the retiring Commissioner. Men who are prompt to—

> Crook the pregnant hinges of the knee
> Where thrift may follow fawning, rushed forward to bear swift witness against their former chief in order that they might become the pampered and favored menials of the present incumbent of the Pension Office. [Applause.]

A MEMBER. You appointed them.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No doubt we appointed them. So did the Master select twelve, but among the twelve He got a Judas. It would be remarkable if among all these the busy and interested search of the Commissioner could not find some one who would turn to slander his former chief to win the smiles of the present incumbent of that office. [Applause.]

I have not time to run through this report. I wish I had. But I must call attention to one further matter. You all know how figures can be made to misrepresent the true state of the facts. It is said figures will not lie, but figures can be made to lie most abominably. We have been regaled by a parade of what Commissioner Dudley failed to do and what the present honored incumbent of the office has done.

But nobody on the other side, not even the chivalrous member from Indiana [Mr. MATSON], mentioned that Commissioner Black came in just as the force was trained and equal to the emergency. The increase of force was appointed in August and began the work, and Commissioner Black came in to reap the harvest of honor due to efficient work, and this done, he turns upon his retiring friend, Colonel Dudley, and seeks to injure him by asserting that every nook and corner of the Pension Office was a political machine, made so by Colonel Dudley. In other words, he insults every man and woman employed in that office by charging that they are mere political machines. His language has vastly more regard to the rhetoric than to the exact truth of his report. In point of rhetoric I find no fault with it at all. I want to call attention for a moment to one or two very choice selections. He says:

> At one time the Pension Bureau was all but avowedly a political machine, filled—

How?

> Filled from border to border with the uncompromising adherents, a single organization, who had for the claimant other tests than those of the law, and who required in addition to service in the field submission to and support of a party before pensions were granted.

Where are they? Point them out. There are ears to which slander flows as naturally as the filthy water in the street to the sewers. He says:

> Not always, but often was this true; not openly, but surely were the tests applied.

When and where and how were these tests applied? Whoever heard of it until the statement was made under menace and threat—implied though perhaps not expressed in words? I do not mean that the august personage said "unless you have information that will enable me to condemn your former chief, I will dismiss you;" but I do mean to say, no man can read the testimony taken by the Warner committee without agreeing with me, that the witnesses were swift, especially Major Clark. He never failed by innuendo and otherwise to assault his chief and to make appear that he had used his office for disreputable and dishonest purposes.

But what else does our distinguished fellow-citizen say? He says:

> The enormous array of the medical boards established in every quarter was almost solidly partisan; made so, not openly but surely.

What does he call "openly?" How are men appointed? He brings here from the files of the office the letter upon which the order was based, nothing secret about it. What does he mean by "covertly?" He says, "Examiners, trained in unscrupulous schools, traversed the country as recruiting sergeants." What unscrupulous schools, Commissioner Black? In the Republican school? Ah, yes; that is unscrupulous, is it? This brings me very properly to the consideration of questions to which my honored friends on the other side have adverted, and whether pertinent to this bill or not, they have been considered. My friend from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON], who has shown to this House how splendidly a brilliant man can present a case which he advocates, has suggested that he deprecates very greatly the discussion of what he is pleased to call "dead issues."

Gentlemen, what are dead issues? We have been constantly embarrassed both by our Democratic brothers and by Mugwumps in trying to determine what are dead issues and what are live issues. Gentlemen have talked here about the ballot and about how it was corrupted by the instrumentality of Colonel Dudley, and one would suppose from the suggestions and innuendoes of my colleague from Ohio [Mr. WARNER] that he stood surrounded by men who were the Lord's chosen and anointed, and who had defended with their bodies and with their prayers the purity of the elective franchise [laughter], and yet history records, and every man within sound of my voice knows, that wherever Democracy reigns supreme an honest ballot and a fair count is a lost art. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I have stated what the record discloses beyond peradventure, and only with the view of stating the exact truth; and whether it is called a "dead issue" or not, it is known of all men that if we had had in this country even the semblance of what our friends seem to so much desire in Ohio, if we had even the semblance of a fair ballot and a fair count throughout the whole country, your majority had dwindled into an insignificant minority. But that, I suppose, is a "dead issue!" Records do not die, nor can the logic by which they teach be buried in the grave of dead issues.

Mr. Chairman, I have not been an idle or an indifferent student of history. I have studied with some care the history of the ancient republics, the ancient monarchies, and modern monarchies, and I have studied with as scrupulous care the history of my own country. The logic of great events reaches past the span of one human life. I have not studied simply to ascertain what dynasties reigned, but the influences that placed them in power. I have not studied to learn who gave Rome a republic, but to learn the influences that made a republic possible. I have not studied simply to learn what power swept from the shores of time the Roman Republic, but the influences that rendered its destruction inevitable. Gentlemen of the Democratic party, in buds of promise and flowers of hope you are magnificent; in mere protestation and lip service you are all that can be fairly demanded; but the records of our country disclose that in the matter of loyalty to great principles, protection of the ballot, friendship to our industries, and devotion to all that makes healthful freedom possible, the fruit your buds of promise yield is bitter.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Not now, if my friend will excuse me. I will yield to him in a few minutes. Mr. Chairman, I am not going into a discussion of why it is that in one-half of this Republic the ballot is suppressed. I know the reason urged for it, and it gives me pause quite often when my friends across the line say to me, "Would you put ignorance in control of the intelligence of our country? Would you put control of the property of the country in the hands of beggars?"

There is much force in that; but, gentlemen, if the end sought were defensible the means are not. Mr. Chairman, I have said that it has been a part of my study to ascertain the causes which led to certain results in history. I have prosecuted that study in regard to other republics as well in regard to our own. I agree that in the resolutions you have from time to time adopted there may be found that which is evidence of determined loyalty and love of country. But, gentlemen, your mere asseverations of devotion to-night must be placed in a column by the side of one which records your deeds. There never was a time when the statute-books of Rome bore greater evidence of the purity, virtue, and patriotism of her people than just preceding her fall—a fall which took place in the midst and was the result of political corruption and the general decay of civic virtues.

So your lip service does not satisfy me and will not satisfy the country. What is the logic of what you have done when compared with the record of your dealings with the country? How is it that you with this record can presume to come and pose as the especial champions of the ballot or anything else that ought to find favor in the country? I am disgusted, if it is not unamiable to say so, at that sickly sentimentality which sees a freckle on the fair face of Republicanism, and seeks relief by bathing in a Democratic sewer. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

I have said, gentlemen, that you were full of buds of promise. Take my own city and my own locality, to which our honored friend General WARNER calls attention. I speak of this matter with some feeling, because I have so often been the object of uncharitable attacks from the unscrupulous in politics. And while they struck down and corrupted the ballot they were constantly offering lip service in favor of a free ballot, being the while strangers to it in the lines of their own experience.

Now what does the history of Cincinnati disclose? In 1876 we had the first organized frauds of which Cincinnati knew anything. The record of the penitentiaries and jails of Southern Ohio will show the fruit that was gathered of that corrupt organization. There was no charge or suggestion that the organization for fraud, for repeating from ward to ward and precinct to precinct, was not in the interest of the Democratic party. But you say, "Yes; you convicted our fellows before Republican juries." That is not true. No man was ever convicted there except before a mixed jury.

What else? So gross and outrageous were the frauds of 1876 that in 1878 Democrats and Republicans alike joined to invoke Federal protection.

Mr. BEACH. Will my friend from Ohio yield for a question?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. If it is in the line of what I am saying, I will yield.

Mr. BEACH. I wish to ask whether the gentleman, when he speaks of the "frauds in 1876," refers to the counting out of Samuel J. Tilden? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No; I do not refer to the "counting out" of Samuel J. Tilden; nor do I refer to the bloody methods—bloodier even than those of St. Bartholomew—by which you sought to foist him on the American people. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. My colleague will allow me to ask whether he adverted to the attempted purchase of an electoral vote in Oregon, or the dispatching of $80,000 to South Carolina to buy a colored man's vote. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My colleague's suggestion is pertinent and timely, but I do not want to be diverted from the matter I have in hand.

In 1878—I speak the truth of history—supervisors and deputy marshals were appointed at the solicitation of Democrats and Republicans alike. On my entrance into this Hall in March, 1879, I was confronted by a petition or memorial containing all that language could convey upon paper in the direction of suggesting intimidation and outrage by myself and fellow-Republicans against the voters of my district. What was the result? A committee, and as fair a one as ever was appointed by this House, went out to investigate—a committee presided over by Hon. JOHN G. CARLISLE, than whom I never knew a fairer man—than whom no fairer Speaker ever sat in that chair [general applause]—it is his reputation at home and it is his deserved reputation here. That committee investigated. Now, I have one fault to find with the committee, and only one. As is the case with most committees engaging in an investigation of that kind, one side was for the prosecution, the other for the defense. In such cases if no case is made out and the majority is for the prosecution, they simply dump the report in without saying a word about it. What they ought to have done—the duty they were charged with—was to come back and report to this House that the electoral franchise had been seriously endangered in some localities and that some just and wise measure should be adopted to correct the abuses, if such existed, no matter by what party practiced.

What was the result of that investigation in another view? That election was found to be the freest, the purest, and the fairest that had been held in Cincinnati within half a century.

What else? Then "the gang" was organized—what we know and what my honored colleague, General WARNER, recognizes as "the gang" was organized. They seized upon Cincinnati. They finally got control of her police. Her police were used to seize the ballot and corrupt it until the outrage became so shameful that Democrats and Republicans alike rose in their might to seize the monster by the throat; and they are endeavoring now to strangle it, although in the accomplishment of that holy purpose they have to fight Democratic officials from the footpad policemen in the street to the supreme judge on the bench at Columbus. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Eighteen hundred and eighty-two I pass over for the present. In 1884, with these instrumentalities called up, we had another onset in which another gentleman and myself were in the arena as contestants. The result is known. A Republican majority was polled in that district in October, but less than that which was given to Mr. Blaine in November, when no supervisors or deputy marshals were appointed. But the moment the sun had gone down on the election, the 13th of October, 1884, a wild cry of "fraud" went up from Democratic throats in the gang. "Stop thief!" was the universal cry; and this House was imposed upon and abused into the belief that a great outrage had been committed. A committee sped out there ostensibly to hunt down Marshal Wright—really to pay out of the public Treasury the expense of laying the groundwork to vacate the seat of the member-elect. That statement may be strong; but I submit that it is thoroughly true. What was the result of that investigation?

What was well known to us was made matter of record for this House and the country. Why, sir, in the night men were seized by ruffianly police, one hundred and fifty-two citizens, some of them voters before the officers who seized them had served their country by quitting it [laughter], and shut in dungeons, and were not permitted to communicate with friend or counsel, and were so kept in a dungeon until after the polls closed on the evening of the day of election, and then turned out without a charge or suspicion of a charge recorded against one of them. Our lovely governor said they were repeaters, and ought to have been shut up. Let me tell you what the facts, the known facts, are, and let reasonable honest men judge whether that statement will hold good.

We did indeed appoint deputy marshals to meet and if possible overthrow the thugs who were there to seize the city. The sewers and avenues of crime in every city within 500 miles of ours were explored in order to find creatures bearing the semblance of man who could be used under the protection of a thug police, deputy sheriffs, and special policemen to debauch the ballot and strike down the will of honest voters in Cincinnati. They came like quails into the camp of the Israelites; each one of them a breathing, social sore, a walking moral and political pestilence. We were admonished, not by Republicans alone, but by Democrats whose consciences would not permit them to learn of such contemplated outrages without providing some defense against it.

What was the sequel? And then I am through with that. They had 1,000 police under the control of men as unscrupulous in politics as my friend would make you believe Colonel Dudley was. What else? They had 1,000 special police. What for? They had 900 deputy sheriffs. What for? To protect imported thugs and domestic scoundrels in debauching the ballot, and kicking honesty and decency into the gutter. And to thwart or hinder this army of political bandits in their work, deputy marshals were appointed. Look for one minute. How is it; and my friend from Ohio, General Warner, knows, if he knows anything—if he does not talk out of the depth of his ignorance, rather from the fullness of his knowledge—he knows there is no place within the corporate limits of Hamilton County where there is ever a riot, where there is ever ballot-box stuffing, where there is anything that suggests fraud and outrage except in the wards which are reliably Democratic.

Nobody denies it. There is no other place where you double, treble, or quadruple the police. They sent us from the State across the Ohio seventy-two earnest gentlemen, provided conveniently with what the average chivalric Kentuckian carries on his hip, to aid us in preserving order!

There is a pretense they came over to see if Kentucky negroes were being voted by Republicans. If they came for that purpose you would like sensible men have taken them to Republican quarters, where negro repeaters would vote, if at all. To spot negro repeaters men would be placed where such repeaters, if such there were, would vote, and not where they could not and would not attempt to vote. You would not place them down where there are none but Democrats; where there are ruffians who deem it a duty to knock a contraband in the head at sight, and where not even well-known Republican citizens were permitted to vote. There would be no need of these watchful Kentucky guardians there.

But there is where they were placed, and where ruffianism held high carnival election day. The consequence was a free ballot and a fair count were as impossible there as it would seem to be in some other localities in this country where they do not pretend to any particular love for negroes, and where their votes are wholly suppressed.

What else? Governor Hoadly had the effrontery to charge these deputy marshals with the riotous events of that day.

Let me call attention, and the record bears me out, to the facts which prove that the charge of Hoadly is groundless. Our police court was presided over by an ultra Democrat. His name is Fitzgerald. He was willing, certainly, if the proof justified it, to send Republican repeaters to the work-house or bind them over to await the action of the grand jury. The Democrats, the gang, if you please, had the police court. They had also the prosecuting attorney. They had a majority of the judges of the common pleas. They seemed to control the grand juries; and would you not suppose they would have hunted down and arrested Republican offenders? They had at command nearly three thousand officers, selected with direct reference to hunting down not merely Republican delinquents but honest, decent men as well. Thus, you see, they had the men to charge, to arrest, to prosecute, and condemn Republican delinquents, if such there were, and you know they would have done it. How many were arrested and convicted? A hundred? no; fifty? no; twenty-five? no; ten? no; five? no. How many then? One! One was convicted, and he was sent to the penitentiary by a creature of the gang for daring to strike down a man, a ruffian, who was attempting to force his way into his house and abuse and insult him.

How many on the other side, agents of the gang, were sent up? More than a score. Not convicted by Republican juries but by juries composed of decent men of both parties.

What else? These outrages by the gang went on until the next election, the election of last year, where, as I have said, frauds were so gross, outrages so palpable and infamous, that the honest people rose as one man to protest against it.

Mr. Chairman, I keep a scrap-book. A scrap-book is a very good thing; it connects different eras, different epochs; it links together facts in the order of their occurrence, which point the logic of events. I want to show you from that book and from the current events of the period what honorable Democrats say about the condition of things in Cincinnati, and at that period, and even now.

Do you [addressing General WARNER] know the Hon. William P. Anderson? Do you? Well, he is an honorable, clean man, who never voted anything but the Democratic ticket in all his life, and that is the only delinquency with which I can charge him. [Laughter.] It is the only one that he will have to answer for, to my knowledge. He, with other honorable Democrats, was ultimately startled into wakefulness by the fact that a gang having seized the machinery of the Democratic party (and I do not charge it upon you, I do not know that you are aware of it), but having seized the machinery of the Democratic party that gang was enabled absolutely to control our city. Mr. Anderson and others recognized the fact that forgery and criminal methods of all kinds were utilized to secure a so-called Democratic victory by the gang. I want to say here that I had proposed to bring into this House the returns from the several Democratic wards in Cincinnati, but I refrained because some of them are too filthy to exhibit to decent men and in the presence of ladies. [Laughter.] And yet in the presence of these offenses, and without condemnation of them, you call Colonel Dudley and arraign him because forsooth he went to Ohio to lend his aid in defeating the success of such planned infamy. Yes, he went to Ohio. He had a perfect right to go there if he wanted to. Why should he not go?

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. But let me remind my friend that he is speaking now of one election; Colonel Dudley went to Ohio in a previous election.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Why, my worthy brother, do you remember the maxim in the law which says, being liberally translated, that no man becomes bad all at once? [Laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I think that is true as to Cincinnati.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Cincinnati has been rotten politically for ten years. A Democratic ring got hold of it and clutched its throat while they robbed its coffers; and yet you stand here arraigning a crippled Union soldier who has no peer in the Pension Office now in point of devoted loyalty to the right, for fighting the leprous pack who were making Cincinnati unfit to live in.

You arraign him here, and while you assail him I have yet to hear a word from you against the infamies that you know were perpetrated all over Southern Ohio.

Speaking of these outrages Mr. Anderson used plain language, which I can not stop to read at length, but will insert.

GOOD WORDS OF A DEMOCRAT—CAPTAIN ANDERSON TO THE COMMITTEE OF ONE HUNDRED.

William P. Anderson, of the executive committee, arose and made the following statement, deliberately:

"Mr. Chairman, I desire to preface a statement I am about to make with a few personal remarks. I have voted the Democratic ticket for over twenty years; have always been a Democrat, and at the last election voted a straight Democratic ticket.

"With this record, after a thorough and impartial investigation, extending over the past three weeks, made as a member of the executive committee of this committee of one hundred, I claim to be able to make a fair statement as far as relates to the part taken by my party in the frauds against the registration and election laws and other outrages preceding and following the last election. These investigations show that the only organized fraud against the registration and election laws at the last election has been within the Democratic party; that the only organizations shielding and protecting the perpetrators of fraud, and endeavoring to hinder and persecute those engaged in exposing and bringing their perpetrators to justice, is also within the Democratic party. Still a Democrat, and diametrically opposed to the principles of the Republican party, this committee and its executive committee have my entire sympathy and hearty support."

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I do not live in Cincinnati, I am happy to say.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. So are we. [Great laughter.]

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. If Cincinnati is as bad and as corrupt as the gentleman who represents one of its districts says it is, let me ask if that accounts for the fact of sending him here? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I do not mean in an offensive sense to say that we are glad; I only mean to say that the man who can find it possible to condemn a legless Union soldier for standing by the flag of his country, standing by the principles the triumph of which he believes to be indispensable to the life of the Republic, and while he is condemning that heroic soldier he can stand with serene complacency, and in a voice of unruffled sweetness praise the miscreants, who were beyond all expression corrupt and rotten in the matter of manipulating the ballot in his own State, would not help us much in purifying our political morals. That is the criticism I pass upon my brother.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Will my friend yield a moment just there?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Of course I must yield. You are so clever I have to do so, but I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Not for a short speech, one right here to the point?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No; not for a speech.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I have some very interesting matter that I would like to inject right here.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. My friend may be very credulous and believe all he hears in condemnation of his adversaries and late associates, but is prone to close his ears to every just criticism that affects his present political allies.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Because Dudley was a good soldier does that justify his proceedings in the Pension Office and his political campaign in Ohio?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. No; nor has he done that which will justify men who have winked at and permitted by their silence the accursed crimes which have been made possible by such agencies against ballot-boxes to stand up and point him out as having been derelict in his duty.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. I say evidence is abundant he did do all that I charge. I have it here. I would like to submit it in connection with the gentleman's speech, if he will yield to me for that purpose.

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I said before there was not a sewer of scandal that was not searched in order to defame Colonel Dudley. As in both investigations in Cincinnati so here. There was not, in my judgment, a weak-minded brother trembling for his office, nor an employé suffering from moral obliquity who was not hunted up to get him to testify against the ex-Commissioner of Pensions.

So it was in the investigation at Cincinnati. The jails gave up their convicts. Men were brought from the streets with a penitentiary smell in their clothes [laughter] to denounce Judge Baxter, Judge Swing, and Judge Sage, to denounce the jury composed of Democrats and Republicans, and they were listened to with perfect complacency. When the question was put to one of them whether he was not an ex-convict there was a rush to his relief as if his defenders were drawn to him by the operation of the law of affinity. [Laughter.] Why, sir, judges were wrong; jurors were corrupt; witnesses were perjured; all was wrong. The only clean, spared monument of Heaven's favor was Michael Mullen, the man who had robbed more than a hundred freemen of their ballot.

Mr. WARNER, of Ohio. Who was Mike?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. He was, par excellence, the leader of the Democracy in their raids upon the ballots in Cincinnati on the 13th of October.

Mr. McKINLEY. Who pardoned him?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. The President pardoned him, but I believe he was imposed upon. I do not think President Cleveland would knowingly give pardon to any man not entitled to it. This Mullen for his service was on leaving prison appointed by his party to a place of honor and emolument, and how fit he was is disclosed by his record, to which I referred, as well as to what has since been brought to light. I have it here—this is the chief of that rare lot of men whom my friend could not find it in his heart to denounce.

Talk of Colonel Dudley in Ohio! Was it his efforts there that led to the rejection by the Ohio Democratic Legislature of George H. Pendleton and Allen G. Thurman and Durbin Ward. Was it Dudley's visit to Ohio that so demoralized the Democratic Legislature that they were bought to betray public decency and official honesty?

A MEMBER. Who bought them?

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. Oh, you can read the testimony. I take it they were not infamous without reward, and did not betray without getting the thirty pieces of silver as the price of that betrayal.

Pendleton and Thurman were the chosen champions of the best type of Democracy in Ohio. Two-thirds of the Legislature were elected to vote for Pendleton to return him to the other end of this Capitol. Never was our grand old State dishonored and dragged into the mud and filth of corruption and its highest official honors sold in the market for cash until a Democratic Legislature, elected by the gentleman for whom my friend has such tender solicitude, put up the Senatorial office and auctioned it off on the block; sold it to the highest bidder.

And yet gentlemen stand up here and criticise Republican methods, and the Commissioner of Pensions refers in his report to the Republican party as the unscrupulous school in which these examiners were trained! My friend knows that Democrats tramped all over Ohio to find in the Republican ranks of the members-elect to our Legislature one Judas Iscariot, one man infamous enough to betray his flag, his country, truth, honesty, and his God by withholding his vote from JOHN SHERMAN, the acknowledged choice of the Republicans of Ohio, and casting it in favor of the huckster who stood ready to purchase, but you did not find one. Is it in a school like that that your examiners learn to be disloyal and unfaithful to country or to flag or to the clean seed of honor and public duty? Yet he says "trained in unscrupulous schools."

Gentlemen, you who cast the 66 votes against the increase of widows' pensions need not speak for yourselves. You will always find some of our brethren down there ambling to the front to do you service. They run over each other to see who will speak first, in order to get your smiles of favor. There is a fitness and propriety about it which I recognize, and you, too. [Laughter.]

I observe, brilliant as these men of the South are, strong as they are in debate, I notice the moment any one on this side says that which might challenge reply from them, before my honored friend from South Carolina, or my friend from Virginia can possibly get out of his chair, one of our old allies runs down the aisle, and protests that you are more loyal, more devoted to our living, and dead, than we who closed their eyelids in death; and having performed that menial service they turn around, and if you smile they are delighted, and if you frown they are in agony. [Laughter.]

I have said your party was a party of promise. Spread out before us our country's history, and read what is written there that you to-night if you are half the men that the gentleman from Pennsylvania described would not have erased from the record and from the book of our remembrance. What line in our statutes has your party written of which you are proud? What station in the highway of progress have you reached? What desirable point in the line of human progress and enlightened advancement has the great train of progress reached under your management?

I know, as does the world, that as we near some station on this highway of progressive civilization you jump aboard of our train, run through and get out on the cow-catcher, and as we move up to the station, shout "Here we are!" [Great laughter.]

Look at the panorama; there goes the Democratic column, here the Republican; here is the highway along which we have marched, there is the highway along which you move, one way or the other; search them out. At every step of our advance along this highway, is that which makes our country glorious and honorable, which elevates, ennobles, and refines a free people. I shall scan your line of march later on.

Let us go over to Europe and sit down together. We meet there some intelligent German or Englishman who addresses us and undertakes to test your faith and mine as to the comparative virtues of our two great parties. He remarks, "You have a great country over there." "Yes, we have a great country," we both chime in together. "You have two great political parties?" "Yes; we have two great political parties." We agree upon that also. Now, for the sake of making it pleasant for you and disagreeable for myself, I will make you the Republican and I will be the Democrat. [Laughter.] The foreign gentleman says, "You are still a united people over there; you still maintain the integrity of your territory?" You say, "Yes." I do not say a word, but look away. He asks: "Was there any party in your country which fought to destroy that integrity?" I do not feel called upon to answer that question, but you say, "Yes, there was—the Democratic party." Then I pluck up courage and say, "But a great many of my political friends marched in the embattled hosts that defended the country." You answer, "Yes; but then they voted as they shot; they left the ranks of the Democratic party when they entered the ranks of the Union Army." He says again, "But you have maintained the supremacy of your flag?" You answer, "Yes." I either say nothing or I say, "Yes; but my party did not favor nor stand by that supremacy."

What else? Our friend says, "You have a sound currency in your country we are glad to see." Then I hop up with enthusiasm and say, "O, yes; we have a sound currency; we have resumed specie payment!" "Yes," you say to me, "but you remember your party was almost solid against resumption." What else? He says, "You fed your soldiers in your great struggle by using the national credit?" You say "Yes." I chime in and say, "Yes; but my party was and is just now a hard-money party." You say to me: "Yes, it was a hard-money party; it was for 'hard money' when the death-rattle was in the throat of the Republic, when the boys in the Army were starving; when to get gold and silver enough to supply them in camp and bivouac was impossible. But what happened? The men at the front received letters from home telling them that the larder was empty and the children without clothing for the coming winter; and they asked the Republic to redeem its promise to take care of their wives and children, and we used the nation's credit to save the nation's life; but you have no lot or part in all that."

And when we came to resume, to redeem the promises we had made, how did the two parties stand? Almost to a man you voted against it. Gentlemen, where and when have you done anything as the champion of freedom? No man ever breathed freer by reason of anything that your party ever did, by reason of any statute it ever enacted, by reason of any prayer it ever uttered. Yet you pose here as the champion of these things and hold our side of the House accountable because the blessings which have been poured out upon this land under a Republican administration have not been greatly multiplied.

I only refer to these things to show that in the presence of your constant protestations of devotion to the right, the record of your country shows you to have been always wrong; wrong on all subjects, and persistently wrong.

Mr. Chairman, I want to refer to only one other thing. I have said that the gentlemen on the other side are full of promise. As you had insisted for years that the tariff was a griveous burden and that the people were being robbed, they had reason to hope that when you came into power you would revise the tariff. You did come into power in the Forty-sixth Congress and what did you do? The wheels of our industries stood still; hungry men walked through the streets waiting for you to take your hand from the throttles of the great engines of industry. Did you revise the tariff? You did not. Why? Because you had to please two wings of the Democracy; you had to please the friends of my honored friend from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] and you had to please the followers of my not less honored friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL], and, as you could not do both, you did neither. Meantime the business of this country stood still. There were empty factories and idle furnaces and hungry men and women and children. That is what you brought about. [Applause.] No matter what you promised, that is what you did.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BUTTERWORTH. I would like a few minutes more.

Mr. TOWNSHEND was recognized.

Mr. McCOMAS. Mr. Chairman, if I can be recognized I will yield the gentleman a portion of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSHEND].

Mr. TOWNSHEND. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise; and I will state for the information of the House that I expect to reach a vote on this bill to-morrow evening.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5201) making appropriations for the payment of invalid pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1887, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT FORT SMITH, ARK.

Mr. ROGERS. I rise to a question of privilege, and call up the message from the Senate asking the appointment of a committee of conference upon Senate bill No. 610.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, March 2, 1886.

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill of the Senate No. 610, to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail in the city of Fort Smith, Ark., and ask a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. MAHONE, Mr. SPOONER, and Mr. BERRY be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ROGERS. I move that the House insist on its amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced as conferees on the part of the House Mr. DIBBLE, Mr. HENLEY, and Mr. WADE.

And then, on motion of Mr. TOWNSHEND (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 3, 1886.

Prayer by Bishop W. X. NINDE, D. D., of Kansas.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

It is made the constitutional duty of the President to recommend to the consideration of Congress from time to time such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. In no matters can the necessity of this be more evident than when the good faith of the United States under the solemn obligation of treaties with foreign powers is concerned.

The question of the treatment of the subjects of China sojourning within the jurisdiction of the United States presents such a matter for the urgent and earnest consideration of the Executive and the Congress.

In my first annual message, upon the assembling of the present Congress, I adverted to this question in the following words:

"The harmony of our relations with China is fully sustained.

"In the application of the acts lately passed to execute the treaty of 1880, restrictive of the immigration of Chinese laborers into the United States, individual cases of hardship have occurred beyond the power of the Executive to remedy, and calling for judicial determination.

"The condition of the Chinese question in the Western States and Territories is, despite this restrictive legislation, far from being satisfactory. The recent outbreak in Wyoming Territory, where numbers of unoffending Chinamen, indisputably within the protection of the treaties and the law, were murdered by a mob, and the still more recent threatened outbreak of the same character in Washington Territory, are fresh in the minds of all, and there is apprehension lest the bitterness of feeling against the Mongolian race on the Pacific slope may find vent in similar lawless demonstrations. All the power of this Government should be exerted to maintain the amplest good faith toward China in the treatment of these men, and the inflexible sternness of the law in bringing the wrongdoers to justice should be insisted upon.

"Every effort has been made by this Government to prevent these violent outbreaks and to aid the representatives of China in their investigation of these outrages; and it is but just to say that they are traceable to the lawlessness of men not citizens of the United States, engaged in competition with Chinese laborers.

"Race prejudice is the chief factor in originating these disturbances, and it exists in a large part of our domain, jeopardizing our domestic peace and the good relationship we strive to maintain with China.

"The admitted right of a Government to prevent the influx of elements hostile to its internal peace and security may not be questioned, even where there is no treaty stipulation on the subject. That the exclusion of Chinese labor is demanded in other countries where like conditions prevail is strongly evidenced in the Dominion of Canada, where Chinese immigration is now regulated by laws more exclusive than our own. If existing laws are inadequate to compass the end in view, I shall be prepared to give earnest consideration to any further remedial measures, within the treaty limits, which the wisdom of Congress may devise."

At the time I wrote this the shocking occurrences at Rock Springs, in Wyoming Territory, were fresh in the minds of all, and had been recently presented anew to the attention of this Government by the Chinese minister in a note which, while not unnaturally exhibiting some misconception of our Federal system of administration in the Territories while they as yet are not in the exercise of the full measure of that sovereign self-government pertaining to the States of the Union, presents in truthful terms the main features of the cruel outrage there perpetrated upon inoffensive subjects of China. In the investigation of the Rock Springs outbreak and the ascertainment of the facts on which the Chinese minister's statements rest the Chinese representatives were aided by the agents of the United States, and the reports submitted, having been thus framed and recounting the facts within the knowledge of witnesses on both sides, possess an impartial truthfulness which could not fail to give them great impressiveness.

The facts, which so far are not controverted or affected by any exculpatory or mitigating testimony, show the murder of a number of Chinese subjects, in September last, at Rock Springs, the wounding of many others, and the spoliation of the property of all when the unhappy survivors had been driven from their habitations. There is no allegation that the victims, by any lawless or disorderly act on their part, contributed to bring about a collision; on the contrary, it appears that the law-abiding disposition of these people who were sojourners in our midst under the sanction of hospitality and express treaty obligations was made the pretext for an attack upon them. This outrage upon law and treaty engagements was committed by a lawless mob. None of the aggressors—happily for the national good fame—appear by the reports to have been citizens of the United States. They were aliens, engaged in that remote district as mining laborers, who became excited against the Chinese laborers as it would seem, because of their refusal to join them in a strike to secure higher wages. The oppression of Chinese subjects by their rivals in the competition for labor does not differ, in violence and illegality, from that applied to other classes of native or alien labor. All are equally under the protection of law, and equally entitled to enjoy the benefits of assured public order.

Were there no treaty in existence referring to the rights of Chinese subjects; did they come hither as all other strangers who voluntarily resort to this land of freedom, of self-government, and of laws, here peaceably to win their bread and to live their lives, there can be no question that they would be entitled still to the same measure of protection from violence and the same free forum for the redress of their grievances as any other aliens.

So far as the treaties between the United States and China stipulate for the treatment of the Chinese subjects actually in the United States as the citizens or subjects of the "most favored nation" are treated, they create no new status for them—they simply recognize and confirm a general and existing rule applicable to all aliens alike, for none are favored above others by domestic law, and none by foreign treaties, unless it be the Chinese themselves in some respects. For, by the third article of the treaty of November 17, 1880, between the United States and China, it is provided that:

"ARTICLE III. If Chinese laborers, or Chinese of any other class, now, either permanently or temporarily residing in the territory of the United States, meet with ill-treatment at the hands of any other persons, the Government of the United States will exert all its power to devise measures for their protection and to secure to them the same rights, privileges, immunities, and exemptions as may be enjoyed by the citizens or subjects of the most favored nation, and to which they are entitled by treaty."

This article may be held to constitute a special privilege for Chinese subjects in the United States, as compared with other aliens; not that it creates any peculiar rights which others do not share, but because, in the case of ill-treatment of the Chinese in the United States, this Government is bound to "exert all its power to devise measures for their protection" by securing to them the rights to which, equally with any and all other foreigners, they are entitled.

Whether it is now incumbent upon the United States to amend their general laws or devise new measures in this regard I do not consider in the present communication, but confine myself to the particular point raised by the outrage and massacre at Rock Springs.

The note of the Chinese minister and the documents which accompany it give, as I believe, an unexaggerated statement of the lamentable incident, and present impressively the regretable circumstance that the proceedings, in the name of justice, for the ascertainment of the crime and fixing the responsibility therefor were a ghastly mockery of justice. So long as the Chinese minister, under his instructions, makes this the basis of an appeal to the principles and convictions of mankind, no exception can be taken. But when he goes further, and, taking as his precedent the action of the Chinese Government in past instances where the lives of American citizens and their property in China have been endangered, argues a reciprocal obligation on the part of the United States to indemnify the Chinese subjects who suffered at Rock Springs, it became necessary to meet his argument, and to deny most emphatically the conclusions he seeks to draw as to the existence of such a liability and the right of the Chinese Government to insist upon it.

I draw the attention of the Congress to the latter part of the note of the Secretary of State of February 18, 1886, in reply to the Chinese minister's representations, and invite especial consideration of the cogent reasons by which he reaches the conclusion that whilst the United States Government is under no obligation, whether by the express terms of its treaties with China or the principles of international law, to indemnify these Chinese subjects for losses caused by such means and under the admitted circumstances, yet that in view of the palpable and discreditable failure of the authorities of Wyoming Territory to bring to justice the guilty parties or to assure to the sufferers an impartial forum in which to seek and obtain compensation for the losses which those subjects have incurred by lack of police protection, and considering further the entire absence of provocation or contribution on the part of the victims, the Executive may be induced to bring the matter to the benevolent consideration of the Congress, in order that that body, in its high discretion, may direct the bounty of the Government in aid of innocent and peaceful strangers whose maltreatment has brought discredit upon the country, with the distinct understanding that such action is in no wise to be held as a precedent, is wholly gratuitous, and is resorted to in a spirit of pure generosity toward those who are otherwise helpless.

The correspondence exchanged is herewith submitted for the information of the Congress, and accompanies a like message to the House of Representatives.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a recommendation of the Light-House Board for an additional appropriation of $60,000 for the establishment of a light at the entrance to Gray's Harbor, Washington Territory; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting additional estimates for clerks in the Register's office; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2148) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a building for the use of the United States circuit and district courts of the United States, the post-office, and other Government offices at Williamsport, Pa.," and making an additional appropriation therefor, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Newark, Ohio, praying for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PLUMB. I present the petition of a large number of representative citizens of Miami County, Kansas, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia, in the Territories, in the Military and Naval Academies, and in the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury. I give notice that in pursuance of the general tenor of the petition I shall move to amend the educational bill by offering an amendment requiring instruction of that kind out of the money which we appropriate. As a bill on the subject has been reported, I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWELL presented the petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the State of New Jersey, officially signed, representing 4,000 Christian women, praying for the better legal protection of young girls in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CULLOM presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Danville, Monmouth, Newton, and La Salle, Ill., praying for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Danville, Ill., praying for the opening to settlement of public and unoccupied lands in the Indian Territory, and the organization of a Territorial form of government therein; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. TELLER presented a petition of 486 representative citizens of Colorado, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a joint memorial of the General Assembly of Colorado, favoring the passage of a bill setting apart a portion of the military reservation at Pagosa Springs, Colo., for a public park; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a joint memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Colorado, favoring the passage of an act granting relief to Anson Rudd, and providing for the issuing of a patent by the United States to him for certain lands donated to him; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented a joint memorial of the General Assembly of Colorado, favoring the passage of a bill to set aside and annul the grant of land to Louis Lee and Narcisso Beaubin, in the State of Colorado; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. FAIR presented a memorial of the Legislature of Nevada, favoring an appropriation by Congress for a hydrographic survey of the State of Nevada; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Legislature of Nevada, favoring certain legislation in regard to the boundaries of the Pyramid Lake reservation; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislature of Nevada, favoring the reimbursement of money expended by the States in the late civil war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRYE presented a petition of William H. Hussey, Mrs. C. C. Hussey, Mrs. Henrietta Johnson, and other citizens of New Jersey, praying for the better legal protection of young girls in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PLATT. I present resolutions passed by the General Assembly of the State of Connecticut, concerning the removal of the naval training school from Coaster's Harbor Island to the New London naval station. I ask that it may be read.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, as follows:

State of Connecticut, General Assembly, January session, A. D. 1886.

[House joint resolution No. 58.]

Concerning the removal of the naval training school from Coaster's Harbor Island to the New London naval station.

Whereas the United States has the title by deed of gift from the State of Connecticut to a tract of land in the towns of Groton and Ledyard, with a water front of about one mile on the river Thames, which land, according to the conditions of the gift, is to be used for naval purposes and is now known as the New London naval station; and

Whereas said naval station, although large sums of money have been expended upon it by the General Government, has been substantially abandoned; and

Whereas said naval station is admirably adapted in every respect to be the headquarters of the naval training school, and could be immediately fitted for that purpose at a nominal expense, while the present headquarters of the school at Coaster's Harbor Island, near Newport, R. I., are, upon the testimony of competent naval officers, unfit for the uses of the institution, and will remain so even after the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of dollars of the people's money:

Resolved, That the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress be requested to make an immediate, united, and earnest effort to secure the removal of the naval training school from Coaster's Harbor Island to the New London naval station, and have said station designated as the permanent headquarters of said school.

Resolved, That the secretary of state be, and hereby is, instructed to transmit a copy of this preamble and resolution to the Secretary of the Navy and to each of the Senators and Representatives of Connecticut in Congress.

STATE OF CONNECTICUT,
Office of Secretary of State, ss:

I, Charles A. Russell, secretary of state of the State of Connecticut, and keeper of the seal thereof, and of the original record of the acts and resolutions of the General Assembly of said State, do hereby certify that I have compared the annexed copy of the resolution concerning the removal of the naval training school from Coaster's Harbor Island to the New London naval station with the original records of the same now remaining in this office, and have found the said copy to be a correct transcript thereof and of the whole of said original.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the seal of said State at Hartford this 24th day of Februry, 1886.

[SEAL.] CHARLES A. RUSSELL,
Secretary of State.

Mr. MILLER, of New York, presented a petition of citizens of Rensselaer Falls, N. Y., praying for the passage of a bill embodying the recommendations of the national pension committee of the Grand Army of the Republic; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Scipio monthly meeting of Friends, State of New York, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Salamanca, N. Y., praying for the opening of the Oklahoma lands in the Indian Territory to settlement, &c.; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented petitions of Knights of Labor of Albany and Brooklyn, N. Y., praying that liberal appropriations be made by Congress for public works; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. MILLER, of New York. I present a petition signed by 236 representative citizens of Delaware County, New York, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; and another petition of similar character signed by 563 representative citizens of Onondaga and Cortland Counties, New York, for the same purpose. As the bill is now on the Calendar, I move that the petitions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a petition of Knights of Labor of Larned, Kans., praying for the passage of a bill to restore the wages of the employés of the Government Printing Office, so that they may be the same as were paid prior to March 4, 1877. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS presented a petition of the Walnut Creek monthly meeting of Friends, State of Kansas, praying for the passage of the bill (S. 355) to promote peace among nations, for the creation of a tribunal for international arbitration, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Ellis, Kans., praying that an appropriation be made for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented a petition of 127 representative citizens of New Castle County, Delaware, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present the petition and accompanying exhibits of Thomas U. Walter, of Philadelphia, Pa., on the subject of his claim against the Republic of Venezuela. I move that the petition and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I present the petition of a large number of citizens of Indiana who served in the late war of the rebellion, praying for the passage of a general pension law. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I have been requested to present a petition of citizens of Indianapolis, Ind., concerning the abolition of the office of President of the United States. I do so without concurring, I presume, in any statement contained in the paper. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Knightsville, Ind., praying for the passage of a law prohibiting Chinese immigration; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Michael McCaffrey, guardian of Patrick Finegan, late a private in Company A, Sixteenth Regiment United States Infantry, praying to be allowed a pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALLISON presented a petition of 235 representative citizens of Marshall and Linn Counties, Iowa, composed of 28 clergymen, 10 physicians, 7 lawyers, 33 teachers, 79 business men, and 23 officers of temperance and other societies; and a petition of 178 representative citizens of Delaware, Grundy, Buchanan, and Brewer Counties, Iowa, composed of 18 clergymen, 8 physicians, 30 lawyers, 34 teachers, 68 business men, and 20 officers of temperance and other societies; and a petition of 172 representative citizens of Clay, Emmet, and Lyons Counties, Iowa, composed of 14 clergymen, 5 physicians, 8 lawyers, 21 teachers, 101 business men, and 22 officers of temperance and other societies, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools, supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CALL presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Key West, Fla., remonstrating against the proposed increase of the duty on leaf-tobacco; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PIKE presented a memorial of the Patrons of Husbandry of New Hampshire, remonstrating against the passage of any measure increasing the rate of postage on fourth-class matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. SAWYER presented a petition of Mrs. L. E. Thomas and 8 other ladies of Waterford, Wis., praying for a sixteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting the disfranchisement of any citizen on account of sex; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EVARTS presented a petition of 472 representative citizens of Ontario, Orleans, and Livingston Counties, New York, and a petition of 122 representative citizens of Clinton County, Ohio, praying for the enactment of a law requiring scientific temperance instruction in the public schools of the District of Columbia and the Territories, and in the Military and Naval Academies, and the Indian and colored schools, supported wholly or in part by money from the national Treasury; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Mrs. Lillie Devereux Blake and other ladies of New York, praying for an amendment to the Constitution to protect women in the right of suffrage; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. EVARTS. I present a petition of the representatives of the savings-banks of the State of New York, representing, I understand, with one or two possible exceptions, all the savings-banks in that State. The representatives of those banks hold in trust for over 1,165,000 persons their savings, averaging about $375 for each depositor, and aggregating the sum of over $437,000,000. The petition is that the coinage of silver may be stopped by law. I ask that the petition, which is not long, may be printed in the RECORD, and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The petition was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, representatives of the savings-banks of the State of New York, respectfully submit that they hold in trust for over 1,165,000 persons their savings, averaging about $375 for each depositor, and aggregating the sum of over $437,000,000; that all the funds and property of the said savings-banks and all their earnings and accumulations belong exclusively to their depositors, chiefly industrious persons of small means, and that your petitioners have no interest therein except as custodians for said depositors. As such representatives we respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to repeal the law which directs the coinage of the 412½-grain silver dollars.

We heartily agree with the opinions expressed upon this subject by the President of the United States in his recent message, and we pray that it may please Congress to enact that the said coinage be discontinued, for the reason, among many others of weight, that its continuance, unregulated by the demands of trade or by the ability of the circulation to absorb it, tends to sever our currency from the gold standard, to compromise the national credit, and to create distrust in the minds of the people.

To make our securities, principal and interest, payable in silver dollars, and thereby to reduce the exchange value of the savings of the people by 20 per cent., would be a loss of purchasing-power of the funds in the savings-banks of New York State alone equivalent to a shrinkage in value of nearly $100,000,000; and that, as the value of the currency would be alike impaired whether in savings-banks or elsewhere, this vast sum would represent only a small portion of that loss to be apprehended from the continued compulsory coinage of the standard silver dollars, the greater portion of which loss must be borne by the industrial classes whose interests we serve.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

Mr. HOAR. I present a memorial, signed by Jordan, Marsh & Co., and some 20 or 30 others, who are among the principal firms and business men in the city of Boston, remonstrating, for certain forcible reasons which they state, against the bill intended to increase the rate of postage on fourth-class mail matter. I ask that the petition, which is very compact (not longer than a proper statement of it if I made it orally under the rule), be printed in the RECORD without the names.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senators and Representatives of the New England States:

The undersigned, business men of Boston, respectfully call your attention to the bill recently introduced into the Senate by Hon. JAMES F. WILSON, of Iowa, which bill is intended to double the rate of postage on fourth-class mail matter.

The rate is now 16 cents per pound, and the proposed change will make the rate 32 cents per pound, or the same as letter postage.

This bill should not be permitted to become a law, because, if passed, its provisions will seriously injure such lines of trade as depend upon the mail for the carriage of their goods, while in every line it will largely increase the expense of conducting business. It will also prove a great hardship to thousands of people who depend largely upon the postal facilities for their daily supplies because of the distance from express offices. At the present rate of 16 cents per pound the price is much higher than that of any other country in the world. If any change is made in the law it should be to reduce the rate to 8 cents per pound, which latter figure is much higher than is charged by England, France, Germany, or any other foreign country.

We trust that you will give this matter your personal attention, as it is one of great importance to the business men and the people of Boston and New England.

BOSTON, February 25, 1886.

Mr. MAXEY presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Denison, Tex., praying for the restoration of wages at the Government Printing Office to a certain former rate; which was refereed to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. COCKRELL. I present a memorial of Local Assembly No. 1528 of the Knights of Labor of the town of Trenton, Mo., praying for the enactment of such laws as will protect the weak and oppressed against the encroachments of corporate power, and for the expenditure of the surplus revenue of the Government in the construction of works of internal improvement and of national importance, and especially for the construction of the Hennepin Canal. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. My colleague [Mr. VEST] is confined to his house by illness, and has sent me a petition which was forwarded to him from California by an old acquaintance, and for that reason I present it. It is a petition of the Los Angeles Board of Trade, of California, for an increased appropriation for Wilmington Harbor, for the erection and maintenance of a Government building in the city of Los Angeles, and for the establishment of a United States district court in connection with certain counties. As it has so many things in it I presume the petition will have to go to the Committee on the Judiciary. The establishment of a district court seems to be the more important part. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Danville, Ill., praying for the construction of the Hennepin Canal; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Knights of Labor of Danville, Ill., praying for the opening of the Oklahoma lands in Indian Territory to settlement; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FAIR, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 42) for the relief of Capt. Nicholas J. Bigley, submitted an adverse report thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MAHONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 531) to provide for the erection of a public building at Lafayette, Ind., reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1131) to amend an act to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon at Detroit, Mich., approved March 2, 1885, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CAMERON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1672) for a public building for a marine hospital at Gallipolis, Ohio, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce; which was agreed to.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 542) for the relief of William Ervin, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GRAY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 290) for the relief of Davidson Dickson and others, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAMPTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1388) for the relief of the trustees of Isaac R. Trimble, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1293) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and pay the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities, and for other purposes, moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 1729), to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to settle the claim of the State of Florida on account of expenditures made in suppressing Indian hostilities; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 457) for the repair of Fort Marion, at Saint Augustine, Fla., and the inclosure of the grounds attached to said fort, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. EUSTIS, from the Committee on Epidemic Diseases, to whom was referred the bill (S. 604) providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the declared discovery of inoculation of yellow fever and protection so afforded against that disease, moved its indefinite postponement, which was agreed to; and submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. 1730), providing for the appointment of a commission to investigate the truth of alleged discoveries of the specific cause of yellow fever and of a method of preventing that disease by inoculation, and to obtain all information possible as to the cause and prevention of that disease; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted a report, accompanied by a joint resolution (S. R. 50) authorizing Lieut. D. Pratt Mannix, of the United States Marine Corps, to accept the decoration of the third class of the Double Dragon, tendered to him by the Emperor of China on account of distinguished services rendered the empire as torpedo instructor; which was read twice by its title.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1444) for the relief of William Schuchardt, United States commercial agent at Piedras Negras, Mexico, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BROWN. I am also instructed by the Committee on Foreign Relations to report adversely in the matter of Capt. D. W. Mullan, of the United States Navy, to whom a medal has been tendered by the Chilian Government on account of the fact that he was permitted to accompany the Chilian army during certain important military operations in the late war between Chili and Peru. The Chilian Government has tendered him as a memento, as it is stated, a medal; and under all the circumstances the committee report adversely on the case.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee will be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. DOLPH, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 438) for the relief of James Filor, William Curry, and William Pinckney, submitted an adverse report thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

STATISTICAL ABSTRACT FOR 1885.

Mr. MANDERSON. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report back favorably a concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of 15,000 additional copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1885. I ask for its present consideration.

The concurrent resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 15,000 additional copies of the Statistical Abstract of the United States for the year 1885; of which 5,000 copies shall be for the use of the Senate and 10,000 for the use of the House of Representatives.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. EVARTS introduced a bill (S. 1731) to equalize the pension of William Riley, late private of Company G, Fifty-first Regiment New York Volunteers, with those who lost the arm at the shoulder joint; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1732) to regulate commercial sales of goods and merchandise by samples, catalogue, card, price-list, description, or other representation, between residents of the several States and Territories; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COKE introduced a bill (S. 1733) to establish a port of delivery at Dallas, in the State of Texas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1734) to establish a port of delivery at San Antonio, in the State of Texas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALL introduced a bill (S. 1735) to provide for a survey and estimate of cost of cleaning out Indian River, in the State of Florida; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a bill (S. 1736) to provide for an addition to the United States building at Jackson, Miss.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GEORGE. At the request of one of my colleagues at the other end of the Capitol I introduce certain bills, and ask their reference to the Committee on Claims.

The bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims, as follows:

A bill (S. 1737) for the relief of James H. Owens;
A bill (S. 1738) for the relief of Helen Loggins, administratrix;
A bill (S. 1739) for the relief of Paschal D. Hammack;
A bill (S. 1740) for the relief of L. B. F. Champion;
A bill (S. 1741) for the relief of Wiley A. Pullen;
A bill (S. 1742) for the relief of Samuel Herd;
A bill (S. 1743) for the relief of Margaret Champion;
A bill (S. 1744) for the relief of William F. Haralson;
A bill (S. 1745) for the relief of Turner Babbitt;
A bill (S. 1746) for the relief of Charles H. Johnson;
A bill (S. 1747) for the relief of Julia A. Thomas, administratrix of J. O. S. G. Greer, deceased;
A bill (S. 1748) for the relief of the legal representatives of Frances E. Gibson, deceased;
A bill (S. 1749) for the relief of T. J. Denson, administrator of the estate of George W. McCabe;
A bill (S. 1750) for the relief of George C. Harper;
A bill (S. 1751) for the relief of Ruth Summers, administratrix;
A bill (S. 1752) for the relief of W. L. Wallace, administrator;
A bill (S. 1753) for the relief of Isaac Haralson;
A bill (S. 1754) for the relief of Franklin Sessions;
A bill (S. 1755) for the relief of T. P. Burnham, administrator of the estate of Dr. J. Burnham, deceased;
A bill (S. 1756) for the relief of Caroline Davidson, administratrix;
A bill (S. 1757) for the relief of W. L. Summers, administrator;
A bill (S. 1758) for the relief of R. T. Cheek;
A bill (S. 1759) for the relief of Louisa Thomas, administratrix;
A bill (S. 1760) for the relief of Mrs. E. A. Anderson, administratrix; and A bill (S. 1761) for the relief of Chatham Davidson.

Mr. PAYNE introduced a bill (S. 1762) for the relief of Harry S. Kellogg, administrator of the estate of Lyman M. Kellogg; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BECK. I introduce a bill to modify the existing provisions of law in relation to the sinking fund, and as it is only ten lines long I ask that it may be read, as I desire to offer a resolution in regard to the subject after a while.

The bill (S. 1763) to modify the provisions of law relative to the sinking fund was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the provisions of law relating to the sinking fund be so modified that hereafter the Secretary of the Treasury shall not be required to pay or redeem over $20,000,000 annually of the principal of the debt of the United States for the purposes set forth in section 3694 of the Revised Statutes, or under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1870, and the acts amendatory thereof.

Mr. CULLOM. I ask the Senator from Kentucky if he has information as to the amount of the sinking fund at this time?

Mr. BECK. I asked to have the bill read at length because at the proper time this morning I shall offer a resolution calling on the Secretary of the Treasury to give us positive information in that regard, so that on next Tuesday the Committee on Finance may act on it.

Mr. CULLOM. I did not hear the Senator's remark. I hope that we shall obtain the information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MAHONE introduced a bill (S. 1764) for the relief of Washington Wright and Simon Basye, surviving trustees of Shiloh Baptist church at Fredericksburg, Va.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 1765) to amend the Revised Statutes relating to the District of Columbia for the protection of girls and for the punishment of the crime of rape; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. INGALLS introduced a bill (S. 1766) granting a pension to William Brentano; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 1767) to correct the Army record of certain officers named therein; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLUMB introduced a bill (S. 1768) granting a pension to John D. Fincher; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1769) granting a pension to Laura F. Sholes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1770) granting a pension to J. H. Thornburg; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GEORGE introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 51) authorizing and directing the Department of Justice to transfer certain rooms which have been occupied by the United States courts to the city of Jackson, Miss.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. MAHONE, it was Ordered, That any papers on file in the office of the Secretary of the Senate relating to the claim of the Shiloh Baptist church of Spottsylvania County, Virginia, be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. WALTHALL, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Mrs. Louisa Jackman and others be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, of New York, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Eliza A. C. Jones be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was Ordered, That Humphrey E. Woodhouse have leave to withdraw the papers in his case from the files of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. EVARTS, it was Ordered, That the papers on the files of the Senate relating to the bill (S. 1599) for the relief of the Phœnix National Bank of the city of New York be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. CLARK, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its amendments to the bill (S. 610) to provide for a building for the use of the Federal courts, post-office, and internal revenue and other civil offices, and a United States jail in the city of Fort Smith, Ark.; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. S. DIBBLE, of South Carolina, Mr. BARCLAY HENLEY, of California, and Mr. W. H. WADE, of Missouri, managers at the conference on its part.

THE SINKING FUND.

Mr. BECK. I offer the following resolution and ask for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to inform the Senate how much, if any, the actual payments and purchases of the principal of the public debt since July 1, 1877, have been in excess of the requirements of the laws regulating the sinking fund, and further to inform the Senate how the existing laws can be carried out in relation to said fund from this time until the $250,000,000 of 4½ per cent. bonds mature.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator from Kentucky if it is his purpose to have any discussion of the resolution at this time.

Mr. BECK. Not a word. I only ask to have the resolution passed because I introduced a bill to modify, if possible, the sinking fund in consequence of the fact that our present debt——

Mr. HOAR. I have no objection to the passage of the resolution.

Mr. BECK. We have had positive information in regard to the sinking fund to 1877.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to it.

Mr. BECK. I ask to be allowed to put in the RECORD, as part of my remarks, a short resolution that I offered in 1878 on the subject, showing the official statement to 1877. It is as follows:

Whereas it is of the highest importance in the present depressed condition of the industries of the people that taxation should be reduced to the lowest point consistent with a faithful discharge of the obligations of the Government and an economical administration of its affairs; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury, in his estimates of the sums to be provided by the present Congress, includes $37,196,045.04 to be applied during the next fiscal year in the purchase of United States bonds under the provisions of the acts of February 25, 1862, and July 14, 1870, providing a sinking fund for the extinction of the national debt; and

Whereas the last Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report to the Forty-fourth Congress, in December, 1876, showed that up to July 1, 1876, the literal compliance with the provisions of said laws from the time they went into effect required the application of $433,848,215.37 to the purposes provided for in said acts, and that $658,992,226.14 had been so applied, being an excess of $225,144,010.77 over the amount required by the law to be so applied up to that date; and

Whereas the present Secretary of the Treasury, in his report to this Congress, in December last, after repeating the statements of his predecessor upon that subject, says, "On the same basis the amount of the sinking fund would have reached $475,318,888.78 on the 1st of July, 1877, on which date the reduction of the debt, including accrued interest, less cash in the Treasury, since its highest point in 1865, amounted to $696,273,348.17," or $220,954,459.39 in excess of the amount required by law to be provided for that fund: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it is unnecessary and inexpedient either to maintain or impose taxes at this time for the purpose of providing for $37,196,045.04 asked for by the Secretary of the Treasury in his estimates for the purpose of providing further for the sinking fund, and that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed not to purchase any bonds for the reduction of the principal of the national debt till the further order of Congress; and that the committees of Congress having charge of the subject be, and they are hereby, instructed not to provide for the payment, during the next fiscal year, for any part of said sum in the adjustment of the taxation required for the maintenance and support of the Government.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

GOVERNMENT LAND IN BATON ROUGE.

Mr. GIBSON. I introduced yesterday a bill (S. 1659) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to transfer the United States barracks at Baton Rouge, La., except that portion that lies westward of a line 50 feet east of the center of the railroad track of the Louisville, New Orleans and Texas Railroad Company, to the Louisiana State University and Agricultural and Mechanical College at said place for educational purposes, and it was referred inadvertently to the Committee on Military Affairs. I ask that that committee be discharged from the consideration of the bill, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not want to interfere with the consideration of the bill, but I should like to know why it should go to the Committee on Public Lands. This land certainly is not public domain; it is military ground now or formerly occupied by the military of the United States; and if there is anything that should go to the Military Committee to be investigated it is a matter of that kind. I know nothing about the bill, and have no objection to its provisions.

Mr. GIBSON. I will state that the Senator from Illinois has precisely the impression which I held when I first introduced a similar bill last year; but I ascertained that by an executive order this public property had been transferred from the War Department to the Department of the Interior, and therefore it is under the jurisdiction at the present time, by that executive order, of the Department of the Interior.

Mr. LOGAN. It makes no difference about that fact; it is land occupied by the military, not now perhaps, but it has been used for barracks and other purposes belonging to the Military Department of the Government. I do not know what kind of an awkward position may have been taken by transferring the land to the Interior Department, but I will make a statement for the Senator's information in regard to one of those reservations. A few days ago, as chairman of the Military Committee, I sent to the Secretary of War for information in reference to one of them, and I was informed that it had been transferred to the Interior Department. I then sent a letter to the Interior Department, and I was informed by that Department that they had nothing to do with it; that it belonged to the Military Department; so that between them I should like to have them settle which one of the Departments has control of this character of property.

But it makes not the slightest difference which Department has control of it; it belongs properly to the military organization of the Government, and therefore this bill should go to the Military Committee. I do not insist on its going there on account of any knowledge I have of it or any objection I have to the bill, but I do not propose to stand here and allow a matter to be taken out of the hands of a committee to which it properly belongs. It has not been very long since ordnance, guns, and everything of that kind was taken out of the hands of the Military Committee for some reason or other, I know not what, and a new committee was organized to examine into that subject. The Military Committee had spent nearly a year in making an examination, had made a report to the Senate of their plans, and everything of the kind, and had got an appropriation of $400,000 for carrying them out; and then all at once a resolution was introduced and a new committee was organized for the purpose of examining those matters that belonged to the Military Committee.

Now, if the object is to entirely abolish the Military Committee, I have no objection as far as I am concerned, if the Senate want to do it; but while that committee exists I shall insist that matters belonging to it shall go there.

Mr. GIBSON. I have certainly no desire whatever to take anything from the jurisdiction or in any way to trench upon the rights or privileges of the Military Committee of the Senate. I introduced a similar bill a year ago, and on applying to the War Department, where I supposed it properly belonged, to ascertain what the view of the War Department was with respect to the transfer of this property for educational purposes, I was informed by the Secretary of War that that Department had nothing to do with it; that the property had been transferred as abandoned property, no longer used as a military post, no longer connected in any way whatever with the military service of the country. I then went to the then Secretary of the Interior, who is at present a member of the Senate—he may not remember it because it was an insignificant matter—and procured from him in writing his opinion on the expediency of this proposed transfer.

The only object I have in the world in connection with this matter is to have the bill considered by one of the standing committees of the Senate, the committee to which it should properly go, in order that the Senate may be advised by that committee what its action should be with respect to the merits of the bill itself. If the Senator from Illinois thinks it should go to the Military Committee I shall acquiesce in his view of the case, for I feel that he and that committee would give to it all the consideration that it is entitled to receive. I have no personal wish with respect to it, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. I will merely say to the Senator that if when all the military reservations, forts, arsenals, and everything of that kind are abandoned they should be turned over as public land, it would be a new feature in the affairs of this Government. That is all I can say about it. If the military authorities of the Government have control of those matters, are they to be taken out of their hands merely by an order? There are sometimes mistakes made in reference to orders. Why should the military reservations of the country be transferred to the Interior Department by the War Department merely to get rid of the trouble, for that is all? They do not belong to the Interior Department at all.

A good many things have been done in this country that there is no particular law for until some court decides what is the law and makes it the law. It is like the Indian reservations of this country. There is not a statute, no word can be found in the statute-books of this country, to authorize the President of the United States to establish an Indian reservation, to diminish or decrease it, and the only authority that is found in the Government to-day to give the President power to do that which he has been doing is in a decision of the Supreme Court based upon nothing. So orders grow up in this way to make law irrespective of the Congress of the United States. So far as I am concerned I do not propose to sit here and allow it to be done if I can prevent it.

The War Department had no right whatever to transfer this property to the Interior Department. There is no law authorizing them to do it, any more than there is a law authorizing the President of the United States to establish an Indian reservation. No such provision exists anywhere in the laws of the United States.

Mr. PLUMB. If the Senator from Louisiana will indulge me for a moment I think I can throw some light on this question. On the 5th day of July, 1884, a law was passed, being chapter 214 of the statutes of the Forty-eighth Congress, the first section of which is in these words, and the bill which was the basis of this law came from the Committee on Military Affairs, of which the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] was then, as now, chairman:

That whenever, in the opinion of the President of the United States, the lands, or any portion of them, included within the limits of any military reservation heretofore or hereafter declared, have become or shall become useless for military purposes, he shall cause the same or so much thereof as he may designate, to be placed under the control of the Secretary of the Interior for disposition as hereinafter provided, and shall cause to be filed with the Secretary of the Interior a notice thereof.

Then follows ample provision in the five succeeding sections for the disposition of these lands by the Secretary of the Interior as public lands of the United States. In addition to that, about a year later in the sundry civil appropriation bill, passed at the second session of the Forty-eighth Congress, this item occurs:

For necessary expenses of survey, appraisal, and sale of abandoned military reservations transferred to the control of the Secretary of the Interior under the provisions of an act of Congress approved July 5, 1884, $20,000: Provided, That all appropriations herein under public lands shall be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

So whatever the action of the President may have been with reference to this particular military reservation, if he, in his judgment, believes this reservation is unnecessary for military purposes he has ample warrant not only in the spirit, but in the letter of the law, to transfer it to the Secretary of the Interior for disposition by that officer, which completely divests the War Department of all interest in it and control over it.

I will say besides that I have somewhere a list furnished me by the Secretary of the Interior recently of all the reservations which have been transferred to the Interior Department under this law, and I should say that fifty or sixty, quite a large number, have been transferred. Whether this was one of them or not I do not know. I only asked the information for the purpose of knowing what the facts were about a reservation in Kansas which I found was included.

Mr. LOGAN. So far as the transfer of abandoned military reservations is concerned I admit that I had overlooked that statute, but the principle is the same. Unless the reservation has been declared an abandoned reservation, the President has no such authority. I do not know in reference to this particular post, but I have always understood it to be a military post, and I have not understood anything about its being declared abandoned. The mere fact of withdrawing troops from a post does not make it an abandoned military post. It has to be made so under law. I am aware now that an act has been passed for that purpose, but authority had to be given by law to abandon a place as a military post. If that has been done, I have nothing to say. If it has not been done, I insist that I am correct that it belongs to the Military Department. I will examine the question and look into it in a day or two, and if I find that this is an abandoned military reservation under the law, I will then report the bill back and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GIBSON. That is satisfactory. I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Louisiana is withdrawn.

Mr. COCKRELL. There is no question that the position stated by the Senator from Illinois in his last remarks and by the Senator from Kansas is correct, and the question depends entirely on whether this reservation is an abandoned reservation and has been transferred by the War Department to the Secretary of the Interior. If it is, the bill should go to the Committee on Public Lands. If not, it goes to the Committee on Military Affairs. In order that the Senate may have full information on that question, I ask for the adoption of this resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War make to the Senate a report showing fully all military reservations transferred to the Interior Department as abandoned and useless under the law of July 5, 1884, and the dates of such transfers.

Mr. PLUMB. I will state that I have a list, which I have sent for, and it will be here in five minutes, which will tell the Senator all about it.

Mr. COCKRELL. We had better have this officially and have it printed.

Mr. PLUMB. Very well; mine is not printed. I got a list from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. WALTHALL. I happen to be on both the Military Committee and the Committee on Public Lands. In the latter capacity I have very lately had occasion to look into the condition of the barracks property at Baton Rouge, and I was furnished by the War Department with the President's proclamation, made in pursuance of the statute just read by the Senator from Kansas, in which this property at Baton Rouge is declared to be one of the abandoned military reservations and turned over for disposal to the Department of the Interior.

Mr. PLUMB. I have now the official list from the Secretary of the Interior on this subject, which I will ask to have read. It is brought down to the 17th day of February.

Mr. WALTHALL. Before that is read I will state that perhaps this property may not be embraced in that list. It was declared to be an abandoned reservation by a special proclamation embracing this and one other reservation only, perhaps supplemental to the list contained in the paper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Kansas ask that the list be printed?

Mr. PLUMB. I do not know what it contains, but I know it contains what purports to be the list. I ask that it be read for information.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., February 17, 1886.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by reference from the Department for report, of a letter from Senator P. B. PLUMB, dated February 8, 1886, asking in behalf of the Senate Committee on Public Lands for a "list of the abandoned military reservations turned over by the War Department to the Department of the Interior."

In reply I have the honor to report that the following described abandoned military reservations have been turned over to the Secretary of the Interior by orders of the President under act of Congress approved July 5, 1884 (Stats. 23, page 103):

Name of reservation.	Date of order relinquishing.
Bois Blanc Island, Michigan	July 22, 1884
Fort Butler, New Mexico	July 22, 1884
Camp Cady, California	July 22, 1884
Fort Crittenden (Camp Floyd), Utah	July 22, 1884
Camp Crittenden, Arizona	July 22, 1884
Coal reservation, Wyoming	July 22, 1884
Fort Fetterman, Wyoming	July 22, 1884
Camp Goodwin, Arizona	July 22, 1884
Old Camp Grant, Arizona	July 22, 1884
Fort Hartsuff, Nebraska	July 22, 1884
Camp Independence, California	July 22, 1884
Island in State of Missouri	July 22, 1884
Fort Randall, Dakota (part east of river)	July 22, 1884
Fort Rice, Dakota	July 22, 1884
Bush Lake Valley, Utah	July 22, 1884
Fort Sedgwick, in Colorado and Nebraska	July 22, 1884
Camp Sheridan, Nebraska	July 22, 1884
Fort Steilacoom, Washington Territory	July 22, 1884
Camp Three Forks, Idaho	July 22, 1884
Fort Verde garden tract, Arizona	July 22, 1884
Timber reservation, Arizona	July 22, 1884
Fort Wilkins, Michigan	July 22, 1884
Fort Wallace, Kansas	July 22, 1884
Old Fort Lyon, Colorado	July 22, 1884
Pagosa Springs (old Fort Lewis), Colorado	July 22, 1884
Camp on White River, Colorado	July 22, 1884
Uncompahgre Cantonment, in part, Colorado	July 22, 1884
Fort Thornburgh, Utah	July 22, 1884
Fort McRae, New Mexico	July 22, 1884
Fort Yuma, California and Arizona	July 22, 1884
Fort Sullivan, Maine	July 22, 1884
Fort Sanders, Wyoming	Sept. 6, 1884
Baton Rouge barracks, Louisiana	Sept. 6, 1884
Fort Dodge, Kansas	Jan. 12, 1885
Small part of Fort Bidwell, California	Feb. 16, 1885
Fort Craig, New Mexico	Mar. 3, 1885
Fort Cameron, Utah	July 2, 1885

In this connection I have to state that by executive order dated January 9, 1884, Fort Yuma was transferred to the control of the Interior Department for Indian uses. Also, on August 7, 1883, the Secretary of War turned over Fort Stevenson post and reservation, Dakota, to the Interior Department for school purposes. On October 15, 1883, the Secretary of War, under act of August 18, 1856 (Stats. 11, page 87), relinquished to the Secretary of the Interior two lots in Saint Augustine, Fla., called the hospital lot and the blacksmith-shop lot.

On April 19, 1884, the Secretary of War relinquished the hay reserve for Fort Boisé, Idaho, and on May 7, 1884, he also relinquished the hay reserve for Fort Lapwai, Idaho. These two relinquishments were made because of a decision by this office, concurred in by the Secretary of War, that the act of Congress approved February 14, 1853 (Stats. 10, page 158, section 9), limiting military reservations in Oregon Territory to 640 acres each, applied to the reservations named because of their location in what was originally part of Oregon Territory.

The foregoing comprises a complete list of military reservations relinquished to the Interior Department within the last three years so far as is known to this office.

Senator PLUMB's letter is herewith returned.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. A. J. SPARKS, Commissioner.

Hon. L. Q. C. LAMAR,
Secretary of the Interior.
